EMPRESMUS, Empresma.

EM'PRION, from εν, and πριων, 'a saw.' Serrated. Galen has given this name to the pulse, when the sensation produced by the artery under the fingers is analogous to that which would be caused by the unequal teeth of a saw.

Empyema is one of the terminations of inflammation of the pleura, and is called also, Pyotho'rax verus, Pleurorrhœ'a purulen'ta, Diapye'ma, Ecpye'ma, Ecpye'sis, Empye'sis seu Pyo'sis pec'toris, Hydrotho'rax purulen'tus, Dyspnœ'a pyothorac''ica, Pneumo'nia

The operation for empyema properly means the making of an opening into the thorax for the purpose of giving issue to the matter collected in the cavity of the pleura, although it has been used for the operation required for the evacuation of any fluid from the chest, or synonymously with Parencentesis thoracis.

EMPYOS, Purulent.

EMPYREU'MA, from εμπυρευω, (εμ, and πυρ, 'fire,') 'I kindle.' The burnt smell and acrid taste, which volatile products—gaseous and liquid —contract, when animal or vegetable substances are decomposed by a strong heat. The cause of this smell is seated in an oil, called empyreumat'ic, which does not exist in the substance subjected to the operation, but is the result of its decomposition. If the empyreuma occurs when the organic substance is placed in a still with a liquid, it is owing to the solid matter touching the bottom of the vessel to which the fire is applied.

EMPYREUMAT'IC, Empyreumat'icus; same etymon. Belonging to empyreuma,—as an empyreumatic odour.

EM'PYROS, Febric''itans. Same etymon. One who has fever.—Hippocrates.

The substance which covers the coronæ of the teeth. The enamel is of a milky white colour, and sufficiently hard to strike fire with steel. Its surface is very smooth and polished, and it forms a thicker layer towards the part where the teeth come in contact, and becomes thinner towards the cervix. The fibres of the enamel are perpendicular to the surface of the teeth, on the ivory of which they seem, as it were, planted. This gives them a velvety appearance, when examined by the microscope. The enamel has no blood vessels, and is not renewed when removed. It is formed of phosphate of lime, and a very small portion of animal matter. A delicate membrane covers the enamel — cuticle of the enamel, Nasmyth's membrane; but so closely united with it, that it can be demonstrated only by the use of chlorohydric acid.

In the former case, it is dependent upon tardy ossification of the fontanelles or some faulty conformation. In the latter, it is owing to some considerable loss of substance in the parietes of the cranium, produced by fractures, wounds with a cutting instrument, caries, the application of the trephine, &c. In slight congenital encephalocele, gentle pressure may be exerted upon the protruded portion. When the disease is of considerable extent, it is fatal. In accidental encephalocele, similar means must be used for confining the tumour, and preserving it from the action of external bodies.

ENDOCAR'DIAC, Endocar'dial, Endocardi'acus: same etymon as the next. Relating to the endocardium, or to the interior of the heart; as 'endocardiac sound or murmur,'—a sound produced within the cavities of the heart, in contradistinction to exocardiac or exocardial sounds or murmurs, which are induced by conditions of the external surface of the organ.

ENDOCARDI'TIS, Encarditis, Cardi'tis inter'na, Inflamma'tio superfic''iei inter'næ cordis, Inter'nal Carditis, Inflamma'tion of the internal membrane of the heart, (F.) Endocardite, from endocard'ium, the lining membrane of the heart, and itis, inflammation. In this disease, the heart's action is visibly increased, and very manifest to the touch; the hand is strongly repelled, and, at moments, is sensible of a trembling vibratory motion. Percussion gives a dull sound over a surface of several inches, owing, according to Bouillaud, to the inflammatory turgescence of the heart, and the engorged state of its cavities. On auscultation, a bruit de souffiet is generally heard, masking one or both sounds of the heart; and the ear is sensible of a metallic ringing with each systole of the ventricle. The pulsations are rapid as well as strong, and, with few exceptions, irregular, unequal and intermittent. The pulse, by the way, does not always indicate the force or number of the heart's contractions.

ENDOCAR'DIUM, from ἐνδον, 'within,' and καρδια, 'the heart.' (F.) Endocarde. The membrane that lines the interior of the heart.

The essential symptoms of this disease are:—violent abdominal pain, increased on pressure; with vomiting and inflammatory fever. Enteritis may affect both the peritoneal and the mucous coat of the intestines; and, in violent cases, all the coats may be implicated. The structure of the mucous and peritoneal coats is different; so are their functions in health and disease. The inflammation of the serous coat, Sero-enteritis, resembles that of the cellular membrane; the inflammation of the mucous coat, that of the skin. The former is usually, therefore, of a more active character. Inflammation of the mucous coat, Eso-enteri'tis, Endo-enteri'tis, Muco-enteri'tis, Mucous Enteritis, Phlegmymeni'tis enter'ica, is generally attended with diarrhœa, and its pathology is identical with that of dysentery. Inflammation of the peritoneal coat is, on the other hand, generally attended with constipation.

Enteritis of the peritoneal coat, for such usually is the meaning of the word in the abstract, requires the most active treatment. Copious bleeding, followed up by a large dose of opium—and, if the symptoms be not decidedly ameliorated, repeating the bleeding and opium—warm fomentations, and blisters, are the chief agents to be relied upon. Purgatives ought not to be exhibited until the inflammation and spasm are abated by the use of the bleeding and opium. When the physician is called early, this plan will usually succeed. Sometimes, Enteritis passes into a chronic state, requiring much careful management. Broussais considered inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach and intestines as the proximate cause of the phenomena of fever.

The contact of the hair with the surface of the eye occasions considerable irritation of the conjunctiva, which is soon followed by chemosis, ulceration of the eye, and other symptoms, such as fever, watchfulness, &c.

If the disease be entropion, as above defined, that is, dependent upon the inversion of the eyelids, it must be remedied,—either by dispersing the œdema or swelling of the eyelids, or by cutting out a portion of the skin. It may depend on too great irritability of the bladder, or on distension, or injury of the fibres about its neck, paralysis of the organ, Cysto-paraly'sis, Cysto-ple'gia, the presence of an irregularly shaped calculus impacted in the urethra near its commencement; rupture of the bladder and urethra; renal disease; or on pressure exerted on the bladder by the distended womb or by a tumour. It often occurs after difficult labour, but generally yields, in the course of a week or ten days; the catheter being introduced twice a day in the mean time.

The treatment must of course vary according to the cause; and when the affection on which it is dependent cannot be removed, the discharge of urine may be prevented by exerting a degree of compression on the urethra, by means of appropriate instruments; or a urinal may be employed to receive the urine as it passes off.

A collection of small, glandular granula, situate in the adipose, areolar texture at the base of the anterior surface of the epiglottis, in a triangular space, bounded anteriorly by the thyro-hyoid membrane and thyroid cartilage. It pours out an unctuous and mucous fluid, which lubricates the epiglottis, keeps it supple and movable, and prevents the larynx from being irritated by the constant passage of the air, in the act of respiration.

Its form is oval; texture elastic; thickness greater below than above, and greater in the middle than at the sides. By its smaller extremity, which is the lower, it is attached to the thyroid cartilage; its two surfaces are covered by the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx. The special use of the epiglottis would seem to be to cover the glottis accurately at the moment of deglutition, and, thus, to assist in opposing the passage of alimentary substances into the air tubes.

The word is derived from επιλαμβανω, 'fulmine,' επιλησω, (επι, and λαμβανω, 'I seize,') 'I seize upon.' It is a disease of the brain, which may either be idiopathic or symptomatic, spontaneous or accidental, and which occurs in paroxysms, with uncertain intervals between. These paroxysms are characterized by loss of consciousness and by convulsive motions of the muscles. Frequently, the fit attacks suddenly; at other times, it is preceded by indisposition, vertigo, and stupor. At times, before the loss of consciousness occurs, a sensation of a cold vapour is felt, hence called aura epilep'tica. This appears to rise in some part of the body, proceeds towards the head; and as soon as it has reached the brain the patient falls down. The ordinary duration of a fit is from 5 to 20 minutes. Sometimes it goes off in a few seconds; at others, it is protracted for hours. In all cases, there is a loss of sensation, sudden falling down, distortion of the eyes and face; countenance of a red, purple or violet colour; grinding of the teeth; foaming at the mouth; convulsions of the limbs; difficult respiration, generally stertorous; with, sometimes, involuntary discharge of fæces and urine. After the fit, the patient retains not the least recollection of what has passed, but remains, for some time, affected with head-ach, stupor, and lassitude.

The disease is in the brain, and is generally organic; but it may be functional and symptomatic of irritation in other parts, as in the stomach, bowels, &c. The prognosis, as to ultimate recovery, is unfavourable. It does not, however, frequently destroy life, but is apt to lead to mental imbecility. Dissection has not thrown light on its pathology.

To the attacks of epilepsy which are unaccompanied by convulsions, as is sometimes the case, the French give the name Petit-mal, and Épilepsie Vertige, Cer'ebral Epilepsy. Fully formed epilepsy is the Grand-mal of the French, Spinal Épilepsy. When furious mania succeeds to a paroxysm, it is termed Mania epileptica and Epileptic Delirium.

In the treatment, the cause must be sought after, and if possible removed. In the paroxysm, but little can be done, but as the tongue is liable to be injured by the teeth, the jaws may be kept open by putting a cork or piece of wood between them. If the fit has been brought on by indigestible food, the stomach must be cleared. It is between the paroxysms that the great effort must be made. Generally, there is considerable irritability and debility of the nervous system, and hence tonics have been found the best remedies. Of these, perhaps the most powerful, in epilepsy, is the argenti nitras, given regularly and continued for months, if necessary. Preparations of iron, copper, and zinc, have also been used, and vegetable tonics and antispasmodics in general. Counter irritants, as blisters, moxa, &c., may be employed, if necessary, along with this course.

Unfortunately, in many cases, these means are found insufficient, and all that can be done is to palliate, removing carefully the exciting causes; such as the use of spirituous liquors, strong emotions, violent exercise, &c.; and regulating the diet.

Anatomists have described several epiploons. The uses of the omentum are but little known. The chief one seems to be, to retain the viscera in situ, and to give passage to vessels.

Epiploon, Colic. Colic Omen'tum, Omentum co'licum, Third Epiploon or Omentum, is a duplicature of the peritoneum, situate along the ascending portion of the colon, as far as its junction with the transverse portion. It does not generally flow from both nostrils, and is very apt to recur. Puberty is the period at which it is most common. Its exciting causes are:—any thing that will induce local congestions, as running, coughing, blowing the nose, &c., provided there be a predisposition to it. A common case of epistaxis requires but little treatment, especially if in a young person. Light diet and a dose or two of the sulphate of magnesia will be sufficient. In more severe attacks, cold and astringent washes of alum, sulphate of zinc, weak sulphuric acid, or creosote, may be used, and the nostrils be plugged anteriorly; but if the bleeding goes on posteriorly, the posterior nares must be plugged likewise,—the patient being kept with the head raised. The flow of blood has been arrested by directing the patient to stand up with his head elevated, compressing the nostril whence the blood flows with the finger, raising the corresponding arm perpendicularly, and holding it in this position for about two minutes. A less vigorous circulation through the carotids appears to result from the increased force required to carry on the circulation through the upper extremities when raised.—Négrier. To prevent the recurrence, strict diet must be inculcated.

EPISTER'NAL, Episterna'lis, from επι, and στερνον, 'the sternum.' An epithet applied to two bones which form part of the sternum, and are situate upon its superior and lateral part. The thin layer of epidermis, which covers parts deprived of derma, properly so called,—as the nipple, mucous membranes, lips, &c. Modern histological researches have shown that it exists, in different forms, pavement, cylinder, and vibratile or ciliated epithelium. Tesselated, pavement, scaly, lamel'lar, tu'bular, or flatt'ened epithelium, Epithelium polyed'ricum, and E. lamello'sum, (F.) Épithélium pavimenteux, covers the serous and synovial membranes, the lining of blood-vessels, and the mucous membranes, except where cylinder epithelium exists. It is spread over the mouth, pharynx and œsophagus, conjunctiva, vagina, and entrance of the female urethra. Cylinder, Colum'nar or Prismat'ic epithelium, Epithe'lium cylin'dricum, (F.) Épithélium cylindrique is found in the intestinal canal, beyond the cardiac orifice of the stomach; in the larger ducts of the salivary glands; in the ductus communis choledochus, prostate, Cowper's glands, vesiculæ seminales, vas deferens, tubuli uriniferi, and urethra of the male; and lines the urinary passages of the female, from the orifice of the urethra to the beginning of the tubuli uriniferi of the kidneys. In all these situations, it is continuous with tesselated epithelium, which lines the more delicate ducts of the various glands. For the uses of the ciliated epithelium, Epithelium vibrans, see Cilia.

Mr. Bowman has applied the term spheroidal to a variety of epithelium, the cells of which, for the most part, retain their primitive roundness; or, being flattened where they touch, acquire a polyhedral figure. At times, these show a disposition to pass into the columnar, or the tesselated variety; and, hence, this form has been called the transit''ional. The spheroidal epithelium is found in the urinary passages, where it succeeds the columnar epithelium of the urethra at the internal orifice of that canal, and lines the whole of the bladder, ureters and pelves of the kidneys. It is found, also, in the excretory ducts of the mammary, perspiratory, and of many mucous, glands; and a modification of it lines the inmost secreting cavities or commencing ducts of glands generally.

ÉPURGE, Euphorbia lathyris

EQUAL, Æqua'lis. An epithet applied particularly to the pulse and to respiration. The pulse and respiration are equal, when the pulsations and inspirations which succeed each other are alike in every respect.

EQUILIB'RIUM, from æquus, 'equal,' and librare, 'to weigh.' In medicine, this word is sometimes used to designate that state of organs, fluids and forces, which constitutes health.

EQUINA CAUDA, see Cauda Equina.

EQUI'NIA, from equinus, 'belonging to a horse.' Glanders, (F.) Morve. A dangerous contagious disorder, accompanied by a pustular eruption, which arises from inoculation with certain diseased fluids generated in the horse, the ass and the mule. Two forms are met with,—E. mitis, contracted from horses affected with grease, and E. glandulo'sa, a dangerous and commonly fatal disease communicated to man, either in the acute or chronic form, from the glandered horse. The veterinary surgeons make two varieties of the disease in the horse—Glanders, Ma'lis, Malias'mus, Ma'lis, Malis, Malleus; and Farcy glanders, Farcino'ma, Farci'men, Mal'leus farcimino'sus, Morbus farcimino'sus, Cachex'ia lymphat'ica farcimino'sa, (F.) Morve farcineuse, Farcin;—the former affecting the pituitary membrane and occasioning a profuse discharge from the nostrils, with pustular eruptions or small tumours, which soon suppurate and ulcerate, being attended by symptoms of malignant fever and by gangrene of various parts:—the latter being the same disease, but appearing in the shape of small tumours about the legs, lips, face, neck, &c. of the horse; sometimes very painful, suppurating and degenerating into foul ulcers. They are often seen together.

The mild cases require little treatment but rest; the more severe generally resist all remedies.

EQUISETUM ARVENSE, &c., see Hippuris vulgaris—e. Minus, Hippuris vulgaris.

EQUITA'TION, Equita'tio, Hippei'a, Hippa'sia, Hippeu'sis, from equitare, equitatum, 'to ride on horseback.' Horseback exercise. A kind of exercise, advisable in many diseases, although improper in others—in uterine affections, for instance. It has been much recommended in phthisis pulmonalis. It is less fatiguing than walking, and consequently more available in disease. But to prevent disease, where much exercise is required, the latter is preferable.

EQUIV'OROUS, Equi'vorus, Hippoph'agous, from equus, 'a horse,' and voro, 'I devour.' Feeding or subsisting on horseflesh.

EQUIV'OCAL, Equiv'ocus, from æquus, 'equal,' and vox, vocis, 'voice.' Those symptoms are occasionally so denominated which belong to several diseases. Generation is said by some to be 'equivocal,' when it is, or seems to be, spontaneous. See Generation.

EREC'TILE TISSUE, Tela seu Textus erectilis, from erigere, erectum, (e, and rigere,) 'to erect,' 'to become erect.' A tissue, whose principal character is, to be susceptible of dilatation, i. e. of turgescence and increase of size. It is formed of a collection of arteries and veins, intermixed with nervous filaments; which form, by their numerous anastomoses, a spongy substance, whose areolæ communicate with each other. Smooth muscular fibres have been detected in it. This tissue exists in the corpora cavernosa of the penis and clitoris, at the lower and inner surface of the vagina, in the spongy part of the urethra, the lips, nipples, iris, &c. Sometimes it is developed accidentally, and constitutes a kind of organic transformation.

EREC'TION, Erec'tio, Arrec'tio; same etymon. The state of a part, in which, from having been soft, it becomes stiff, hard, and swollen by the accumulation of blood in the areolæ of its tissue, as in the case of the penis—Styma, Stysis.

ERECTOR CLITORIDIS, Ischio-cavernosus —e. Penis, Ischio-cavernosus.

Augmentation of the vital phenomena in any organ or tissue. Orgasm. Under this name, Mr. Pearson has described a state of the constitution produced by mercury acting on it as a poison. He calls it Mercu'rial Er'ethism or Erethis'mus. It is characterized by great depression of strength; anxiety about the præcordia; irregular action of the heart; frequent sighing; tremors; small, quick, sometimes intermitting pulse; occasional vomiting; pale, contracted countenance, and sense of coldness; but the tongue is seldom furred, nor are the vital and natural functions much disturbed. In this state any sudden exertion may prove fatal.

ERGOT, (F.) Ergot, 'a spur.' Er'gota, Seca'lis cornu'tum seu mater'num seu tur'gidum seu temulent'um seu luxu'rians seu clava'tum, Clavus secali'nus seu seca'lis seu Silig''inis, Spermœ'dia clavus, Mater seca'lis, Calcar, Seca'lis mater, Utila'go, Frumen'tum cornu'tum seu cornicula'tum seu luxu'rians seu tur'gidum seu temulen'tum, Brizoc'eras [?], Melanophy'ma, Spurred or Horned Rye, Spur, Hornseed, Cockspur Rye, Cockspur, (F.) Seigle ergoté ou cornu ou corrompu ou à Éperon ou Ergotisé, Blé cornu, Ergot ou clou ou mère de seigle, Bled avorté ou farouche, Faux seigle. Ergot is generally considered to be the result of a disease in rye, occurring most frequently when a hot summer succeeds a rainy spring. Decandolle, however, regards it as a parasitic fungus, and calls it Sclero'tium clavus; whilst Leveillé esteems it to be a fungus giving a coating to the diseased grain; the medical virtues residing in the coating. This parasitic fungus he calls Sphace'lia seg''etum. More recently, it has been maintained, that it is a diseased state of the grain occasioned by the growth of a fungus not previously detected, to which the names Ergotæ'tia abortans seu abortifa'ciens, Oïdium abortifa'ciens, Ergot-mould, have been given. It is found projecting from among the leaves of the spike or ear, and is a long, crooked excrescence, resembling the spur of a cock, pointed at its extremities, of a dark brown colour externally, and white within.

This substance has been long used in Germany to act on the uterus, as its names Mutterkorn and Gebärpulver ('womb-grain,' pulvis parturiens, pulvis ad partum) testify. Upwards of forty years ago, it was recommended in this country, by Dr. John Stearns, of Saratoga County, New York, for accelerating parturition; and since that period, numerous testimonials have been offered in its favour. Half a drachm of the powder is gently boiled in half a pint of water, and one-third part given every 20 minutes, until proper pains begin. Some recommend the clear watery infusion; others advise the powder; others the oil; and others the wine. It is obvious that, in many cases, the uterine efforts would return in the period which would necessarily elapse in the administration of ergot; so that several of the cases, at least, of reputed efficacy, may not have been dependent upon the assigned agent. Ergot also possesses, it is affirmed, narcotic virtues, which have rendered it useful in hemorrhagic and other affections of excitement.

Bread, made of spurred rye, has been attended with the effects described under Ergotism.

ERGOTINE, Ergotin.

ER'GOTISM, Ergotis'mus, from ergota, 'ergot.' Morbus cereal'lis. Poisoning by ergot. An affection produced by the use of spurred rye. At times, the symptoms are limited to vertigo, spasms, and convulsions. See Convulsio cerealis. Most commonly, there is torpor with numbness of the hands and feet, which waste away, lose sensation and the power of motion, and separate from the body by dry gangrene,—Ergotis'mus Sphacelo'sus, Sphac''elus cereal'is, Necro'sis cereal'is, Gangræ'na ustilagin'ea, Necrosis ustilagin'ea, Ergot or Mildew mortification, (F.) Ergotisme gangréneux, Gangrène des Solonois, Mal de Sologne.

ERROR LOCI, Apoplane'sis, (F.) Erreur de Lieu. A term, frequently used by Boerhaave to express deviation of fluids, when they enter vessels not destined for them. Boerhaave admitted several orders of capillary vessels, the diameters of which went on decreasing. The largest received red blood, those which came next received only white, others only lymph, whilst the last of all were destined for yet more subtle fluids —for a kind of vapour. When the red globules entered vessels destined for the white, or the white those intended for the thinner fluids, there was, according to the theory of Boerhaave, an error loci, the proximate cause of inflammation and other mischiefs. See Aberration.

It is a vegetable powder, which, when mixed with milk and soup and taken night and morning, is said to have succeeded in removing old and obstinate obstructions! Buchner thinks it is bean-meal, Ditterich, the meal of the seed of Ervum Ervilia.—Aschenbrenner.

A specimen of Warton's Ervalenta, obtained at the depôt, and analyzed by Dr. Hassall, was found to contain a mixture of the French and German lentil, reduced to powder, including portions of the shells or husks, and of a substance very closely resembling, in its microscopic characters, corn meal. A sample of Du Barry's Revalen'ta Arab'ica was found to consist of a mixture of the Egyptian or Arabian lentil and barley meal.

Superficial inflammation of the skin, with general fever, tension and swelling of the part; pain and heat more or less acrid; redness diffused, but more or less circumscribed, and disappearing when pressed upon by the finger, but returning as soon as the pressure is removed. Frequently, small vesicles appear upon the inflamed part, which dry up and fall off, under the form of branny scales. Erysipelas is, generally, an acute affection: its medium duration being from 10 to 14 days. It yields, commonly, to general refrigerant remedies. Topical applications are rarely serviceable. At times, when the disease approaches the phlegmonous character, copious bleeding and other evacuants may be required, as in many cases of erysipelas of the face; but this is not commonly necessary. In most cases, indeed, the general action seems deficient, and it becomes necessary to give tonics.

When erysipelas is of a highly inflammatory character, and invades the parts beneath, it is termed Erysip'elas phlegmono'des, (F.) Érysipèle phlegmoneux: when accompanied with phlyctenæ, and the inflammation terminates in gangrene, Erysip'elas gangræno'sum, (F.) Érysipèle gangréneux; and when associated with infiltration of serum, Erysip'elas œdamato'sum, (F.) Érysipèle œdamateux.

By this is meant the separation of the dead portions of a bone, tendon, aponeurosis, or cartilage, under the form of lamellæ or small scales. Exfoliation is accomplished by the instinctive action of the parts, and its object is to detach the dead portion from those subjacent, which are still alive. For this purpose the latter throw out fleshy granulations, and a more or less abundant suppuration occurs, which tends to separate the exfoliated part, — now become an extraneous body. The ancients distinguished exfoliation into sensible and insensible, according as the dead portions of bone were detached in fragments of greater or less size, or in very thin pieces, and in an almost insensible manner. When the dead part embraces all or almost all the substance of a bone, it takes the name Sequestrum.

The external, terminating on the mucous and external dermoid system, where they pour the matter of perspiration. 2. The internal, comprising those of the areolar and medullary tissues, and of synovial surfaces; and, 3. The nutritive exhalants, which vary in each organ where they are found, and preside over the phenomena of composition and increase of every part of the body. The exhalants are the antagonists of the absorbents. They are imaginary vessels, inasmuch as they cannot be detected.

The organs, found in this kind of hernia, are particularly, — the epiploon, the jejunum, the arch of the colon, and sometimes the stomach. The tumour is, in general, round, and presents all the characters of hernia. It is, commonly, really reducible, and not subject to strangulation. It must be reduced, and retained by an elastic bandage, made in the form of a girdle, and furnished with a pad at its middle part. When strangulated, the stricture may be divided upwards and towards the left side.

The following are the chief reputed expectorants:—Ammoniacum; Asafœtida; Galbanum; Ipecacuanha; Myroxylon; Myrrha; Inhalations of Iodine, Stramonium, Tar, Burning Wool, Tobacco, &c.; Scilla; Senega, and Tolutanum.

EXPE'RIENCE, Experien'tia, Peira, Empei'ra, from ἐξ, and πειρα, 'a trial.' A knowledge of things acquired by observation. In medicine, this knowledge can be obtained both by the practitioner's own experience, and by that obtained from tradition and from books. To profit by experience requires a mind capable of appreciating the proper relations between cause and effect; and hence it happens, that false experience, Experien'tia fallax, is extremely common; and that a man had better, in many instances, trust to that which he has learned from others, than to his own fallacious observation.

The union of accurate observation by the physician with that handed down by medical writers constitutes perfect experience, so far as it is attainable in any individual case.

EXTRACTA, see Extractum — e. Fluida, see Extractum.

EXTRACTIF, Extractive.

EXTRAC'TION, Extrac'tio, Exæ'resis, Exogo'gē, Exolcē, Exelcys'mus, Enchylo'sis, from extrahere, extractum, (ex, and trahere,) 'to draw out.' The act of removing an extraneous substance from any part of the body. Thus, a splinter is said to be extracted. It is also applied to the removal of certain parts. The cataract is said to be extracted; a tooth is extracted, when carious, &c.

EXTRAC'TIVE, (F.) Extractif. Same etymon. A peculiar, immediate principle, which has been admitted in extracts. Thus, bitter extractive is the immediate principle of bitter vegetables, &c.

EXTRACTS, see Extractum — e. Fluid, see Extractum.

EXTRAC'TUM, Extract, Ecchylo'ma, (F.) Extrait, Apostolé. Same etymon. An extract is prepared by evaporating vegetable solutions, till a tenacious mass is obtained. When prepared from an infusion or decoction, it is called a watery; from ether, an ethereal; and from alcohol, an alcohol'ic or a spirituous extract. Both kinds contain all the principles of the vegetable that are soluble in the menstrua with which they are prepared; but the volatile parts are dissipated, and some of the fixed parts are decomposed; the proper extractive is oxygenized, and the virtues of the vegetable substance consequently altered or destroyed. Extracts are hard, soft, or fluid: the consistence of the soft being such as to retain the pilular form without the addition of a powder. A patent was taken out, many years ago, by a Mr. Barry, of London, for preparing them in vacuo; and, as the temperature is much lower than in the ordinary method, the virtues of the plant are less altered, and the extracts are generally green. Extracts are also prepared by displacement or percolation. They have, likewise, received different names, according to their predominant principle. The gummy or mucous, or mucilaginous, are those which are mainly composed of gum or mucilage. Gum tragacanth may be considered a pure gummy extract. Gelatinous extracts are those composed especially of gelatin; resinous extracts, those of a resinous character; extracto-resinous, those composed of extractive or colouring matter and resin; gum-resinous, those containing gum and resin; and sapona'ceous or sapona'ceous saline, those containing a notable quantity of saline substances and a resinous matter, so combined with mucus and other soluble substances, that they cannot be separated. Under the name Fluid Extracts — Extracta Flu'ida — a class of preparations has been introduced into the United States Pharmacopœia (1851), the distinctive character of which is, the concentration of the active ingredients of medicinal substances into a small bulk, in the liquid form. Extractum sarsaparillæ fluidum is one of these.

It is seated in the orbit, while its dependencies, called by Haller Tutam'ina Oc'uli, occupy the circumference of the cavity, and are composed of the eyebrows, the eyelids, cilia, glands of Meibomius, &c. The Ball, Globe, or Bulb of the Eye, Bulbus Oc'uli, is covered anteriorly by the tunica conjunctiva; is moved by six muscles, four straight, two oblique, and is constituted of membranes, as the sclerotic, cornea, choroid, tunica Jacobi, retina, iris, hyaloid, and, in the fœtus, the membrana pupillaris; and of fluids, called Humours, or Media,—the aqueous, crystalline, and vitreous. The eyeball is invested with a membranous tunic, which separates it from the other structures of the orbit, and forms a smooth, hollow surface, by which its motions are facilitated. This investment has been called cell'ular capsule of the eye, oc'ular capsule, tu'nica vagina'lis oc'uli, vag''inal coat, and submus'cular fascia of the eye. The vessels of the eye proceed from the ophthalmic artery. The nerves, except the optic, are chiefly furnished from the ophthalmic ganglion. It is formed of 13 bones, viz., the two superior maxillary, the two malar, the two ossa nasi, the two ossa unguis, the vomer, the two ossa spongiosa inferiora, the two palate bones, and the inferior maxillary, without including the frontal portion of the os frontis, and the 32 teeth, which may be considered to form part of it. Its numerous muscles are chiefly destined for the organs of sight, hearing, taste, and smell. Its arteries proceed from the external carotid: its veins end in the jugular, and its nerves draw their origin immediately from the brain.

The face experiences alterations in disease, which it is important to attend to. It is yellow in jaundice, pale and puffy in dropsy; and its expression is very different, according to the seat of irritation, so that, in infants, by an attention to medical physiognomy, we can often detect the seat of disease.

Hippocrates has well depicted the change which it experiences in one exhausted by long sickness, by great evacuations, excessive hunger, watchfulness, &c., threatening dissolution. Hence this state has been called Facies Hippocrat'ica, Facies Cadaver'ica, F. Tortua'lis. In this, the nose is pinched; the eyes are sunk; the temples hollow; the ears cold, and retracted; the skin of the forehead tense, and dry; the complexion livid; the lips pendent, relaxed, and cold, &c.

The term Face (F.) is likewise given to one of the aspects of an organ; thus, we say, the superior face of the stomach.

FACIAL ARTERY, La'bial artery, An'gular or external max'illary artery, A. palato-labial—(Ch.), is a branch of the external carotid, which rises beneath the digastricus, and is distributed to almost every part of the face. This nerve arises from the inferior and lateral part of the tuber annulare, in the groove which separates it from the medulla oblongata, external to the corpora olivaria, and by the side of the auditory nerve. It issues from the cranium by the meatus auditorius internus; enters the aqueduct of Fallopius; receives a branch of the Vidian nerve; forms a gangliform swelling—Intumescen'tia gangliform'is;—sends off filaments to the internal muscles of the malleus and stapes; furnishes, according to many anatomists, that called Chorda Tympani; makes its exit at the foramen stylo-mastoideum, and divides into two branches—the temporo-facial, and cervico-facial. On the face it is termed Pes anseri'nus, Plexus nervo'rum anseri'nus. See Portio Wrisbergii.

FACIAL VEIN, Pal'ato-labial—(Ch.), arises between the skin and frontalis muscle, and bears the name Vena Fronta'lis, (F.) Veine frontale ou V. Préparate. It then descends, vertically, towards the greater angle of the eye, where it is called Angula'ris; and afterwards descends, obliquely, on the face, to open into the internal jugular, after having received branches, which correspond with those of the facial artery. It is only in the latter part of its course that it is called Facial Vein. Chaussier calls the external carotid artery, Facial Artery.

FA'CIENT, faciens, 'making,' from facio, 'I make.' A suffix, as in Calefacient, Rubefacient, &c., 'warm making,' 'red making.'

They are called, also, Espèces Vulnéraires, and Thé Suisse. Within the present century, in England, a kind of vulnerary beer was often prescribed, in country practice, in all cases of inward bruises. It bore the name Cervisi'a nigra, or black beer, and was formed by infusing certain reputed vulnerary herbs in beer or ale.

The infusion of the Falltranck is aromatic, and slightly agreeable, but of no use in the cases for which it has been particularly recommended.

TABLE OF COMMON FALSIFICATIONS OF SOME OF THE MOST USEFUL DRUGS, &c.

MEDICINES.	ADULTERATIONS.	MODE OF DETECTION.
ACACIÆ GUMMI.	Gum Senegal.....	G. S. is clammy and tenacious. The A. G. is perfectly soluble in water, and its solution limpid.
ACETUM DESTILLATUM.	Sulphuric Acid.....	Acetate of barytes causes a white precipitate.
	Nitric Acid.....	By evaporating it, the residuum deflagrates, when thrown on burning charcoal.
	Copper.....	Supersaturate with ammonia—a blue colour is produced.
	Lead.....	Sulphuretted hydrogen causes a dark precipitate.
ACIDUM MURIATICUM.	Sulphuric Acid.....	Deposites by evaporation the salts it may contain; precipitates with solution of hydrochlorate of baryta if it contains sulphuric acid.
—— NITRICUM.	Muriatic and Sulphuric Acids.	The presence of chlorine is indicated by a precipitate with nitrate of silver: that of sulphuric acid by the same result with hydrochlorate of baryta.
—— SULPHURICUM.	Muriatic and Nitric Acids.	The presence of muriatic and nitric acid is indicated by the smell, when the acid tested is strongly heated.
—— CITRICUM.	Tartaric and Oxalic Acids.	Their presence is indicated by forming a granular sediment in a concentrated solution of a neutral salt of potassa.

MEDICINES.	ADULTERATIONS.	MODE OF DETECTION.
ÆTHER RECTIFICATUS.	Too dilute.	The S. G. detects this.
	Sulphuric Acid	By acetate of baryta. Precipitate white.
	Alcohol	With phosphorus a milky instead of limpid solution is formed.
AQUA AMMONIÆ. AMMONIÆ CARBONAS.	Carbonic Acid	A precipitation occurs on adding a solution of muriate of lime. It should be capable of complete volatilization by heat.
AMMONIACUM.....		The Guttæ Ammoniaci are white, clear, and dry. The lump Ammoniacum, lapis Ammoniaci, is often adulterated with common resin.
AMMONII SULPHURETUM.	.....	It ought to be entirely volatilized by a red heat.
	Lead.	Imparts a foliated texture, and is not vaporizable.
	Arsenic	A smell of garlic is emitted when thrown on live coals, &c.
	Manganese and Iron.	Are not vaporizable.
ARGENTI NITRAS.	Copper.....	The solution assumes a blue colour, when supersaturated with ammonia. It may be suspected when the salt deliquesces.
	Nitrate of Potassa.	The adulteration with nitrate of potassa is easily recognized by the fracture of a stick of it, which is radiated when pure, and granular if adulterated; or by precipitating a solution of the salts with a sufficient quantity of muriatic acid, and evaporating the clear liquor: the nitrate of potassa or other salts will remain.
ARSENICUM ALBUM.	Chalk, Sulphate of Lime, Sulphate of Baryta.	Not volatizable by heat.
BALSAMUM PERUVIANUM.	A mixture of Resin and some Volatile Oil, with Benzoin.	Not easily detected.
CAPSICUM. Cayenne Pepper.	Chloride of Sodium.....	This disposes it to deliquesce.
	Red Lead	Digest in acetic acid, and add a solution of sulphuret of ammonia — a dark-coloured precipitate will be produced.
CASTOREUM. Castor.	A mixture of dried blood, gum ammoniac, and a little real castor, stuffed into the scrotum of a goat.	Smell and taste will generally detect the fraud.
CERA FLAVA. Yellow Wax.	Earth or Peasmeal	May be suspected when the cake is brittle and colour grayish.
	Resin.....	Put it in cold alcohol, which will dissolve the resin, without acting on the wax.
	Tallow	Is known by the greater softness and unctuosity, and its smell when melted. Turmeric is generally added in this case to obviate the paleness.
CERA ALBA. White Wax.	White Lead	Melt the wax, the oxide will subside.
	Tallow	The cake has not its ordinary translucency.
CINCHONA. Bark.	This is variously adulterated, but generally with the Carthagena and other inferior barks.	Can only be detected by practice, and examining into the quantity of quinia or cinchonia it contains.
COCCUS. Cochineal.	Pieces of dough formed in moulds, and coloured with cochineal.	Throw it into water, the adulteration will appear.
COLOMBA.	.....	The true is distinguishable from the false Colomba by adding to an infusion of the root, a few drops of solution of sulph. iron, which gives to the infusion of the false Colomba a greenish black colour; but produces no change in the other.
COPAIBA. Balsam of Copaiva.	Oil.....	If it does not retain its spherical form when dropped into water, its adulteration may be inferred. Mix one part of strong liquid ammonia of 22°, with three parts of copaiba. If pure, the mixture will, in a few minutes, become transparent; if not, it will remain opake.
CROCUS. Saffron.	Fibres of smoked Beef..	Affords an unpleasant odour when thrown on live coals.
	Petals of the Calendula officinalis, and Carthamus Tinctorius.	Infuse the specimen in hot water, and the difference will be perceptible.

Medicines.	Adulterations.	Mode of Detection.
Cubeba. Cubebs.	Turkey Yellow Berries, or the dried fruit of the Rhamnus Catharticus.	Detected by attentive examination.
Cusparia Cortex. Angustura Bark.	False Angustura sometimes sold for it.	The epidermis of the true Cusparia is characterized by being covered with a matter resembling the rust of iron.
Guaiaci Resina. Resin of Guaiacum.	Common Resin	Detected by the turpentine smell emitted when thrown upon hot coals.
	Manchineel Gum	Add to the tincture a few drops of spirit of nitre, and dilute with water; the guaicum is precipitated—the adulteration floats in the white striæ.
Hydrargyri Chloridum Mite. Calomel.	Corrosive Sublimate, and Subnitrate of Bismuth.	A precipitation will be produced by the carbonate of potass, from a solution made by boiling the suspected sample with a small portion of muriate of ammonia in distilled water; or, the presence of deuto-chloride of mercury is indicated, by warming gently a small quantity of calomel in alcohol, filtering and adding to the clear liquor some lime-water, by which a reddish yellow precipitate is afforded. When calomel is rubbed with a fixed alkali, it ought to become intensely black, and not exhibit any orange hue.
Hydrargyri Oxidum Rubrum. Red Precipitate.	Red Lead	Digest in acetic acid: add sulphuret of ammonia, which will produce a dark coloured precipitate. It should be totally volatilized by heat.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Rubrum	Red Lead	Digest in acetic acid, and add sulphuret of ammonia—a black precipitate will be produced.
Hydrargyri Sulphuretum Nigrum.	Ivory Black	Throw a suspected portion on hot coals—the residuum will detect the fraud.
Iodine.	Plumbago, Charcoal, and Oxide of Manganese.	The tests of its purity are — that it is perfectly soluble in ether. Heated on a piece of glass or porcelain, it sublimes without residuum.
Jalapæ Radix. Jalap Root.	Bryony Root, spurious or false Jalap Root, and Liquorice Root.	Bryony root is of a paler colour, and less compact texture, and does not easily burn at the flame of a candle. Liquorice is detected by the taste.
Magnesia.	Lime	Detected by the solution in dilute sulphuric acid affording a precipitate with oxalate of ammonia.
	Sulphuret of Lime	Gives off when moistened, the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen.
Magnesiæ Subcarbonas. Carbonate of Magnesia.	Chalk	Detected by adding dilute sulphuric acid to the suspected substance, when, if chalk be present, there will be a white insoluble precipitate.
	Gypsum	Boil in distilled water, and test the solution by a barytic and oxalic reagent.
Manna.	A factitious article, consisting of honey or sugar, mixed with scammony, is sometimes sold for it.	The colour, weight, transparency and taste detect it.
Morphia et ejus Sales. Morphia and its Salts.	.....	Morphia and its salts, when placed in contact with nitric acid, are coloured red; with persalts of iron, blue. They are perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and acidulated warm water. When morphia is mixed with narcotina, the adulteration is ascertained by mixing them with sulphuric ether, which dissolves the narcotina, without sensibly affecting the morphia.
Moschus. Musk.	Dried Blood	The bag must not appear to have been opened. This may be suspected, if it emits a fetid smoke when inflamed.
	Asphaltum	Discovered by its melting and running, before it inflames.
	Fine particles of Lead ..	Rub with water. The metallic particles will subside.
Olea Destillata. Essential Oils.	Fixed Oils	Touch writing paper with it, and hold it before the fire: fixed oil leaves a stain of grease.
	Alcohol	Add water. A milkiness and increase of temperature occurs.
Oleum Ricini. Castor Oil.	Olive or Almond or Poppy Oil.	Alcohol S. G. ·820 will mix with any proportion of castor oil, whilst it dissolves very little of the others.

Tragacanth, Linseed Oil, Cow's Dung.*	The best opium is covered with leaves and the reddish capsules of a species of Rumex. The inferior kinds have capsules adherent. It is bad when soft and friable, when intensely black or mixed with many impurities, and when sweet. The quantity of morphia affords the best test.
Potassii Iodidum. Iodide of Potassium.	Chlorides of Potassium and Sodium, Nitrate of Potassa.	The adulteration is ascertained by precipitating a solution of the salt with nitrate of silver, and treating the precipitate with ammonia, which dissolves the chloride of silver, without acting upon the iodide of this metal.
Quiniæ Sulphas. Sulphate of Quinia.	Mannite.....	Leaves no residue when submitted to calcination: is perfectly soluble in warm alcohol, and in water slightly acidulated with sulphuric acid.
Strychnæ et ejus Sales. Strychnia and its Salts.	Brucia.....	They are free from brucia when no colour is produced by contact with nitric acid.
Zinci Oxydum. Flowers of Zinc.	Chalk.....	Sulphuric acid excites an effervescence.

FASCIA, CRIB'RIFORM, F. Cribrifor'mis. The sieve-like portion of the fascia lata; so called from its being pierced by numerous openings for the passage of lymphatic vessels.

FASCIA DENTA'TA, F. D. Tari'ni, Corps godronné of Vicq d'Azyr. A band of gray matter seen beneath the tænia hippocampi on raising it up, which runs along the inner border of the cornu ammonis. It is, as it were, crenated by transverse furrows.

FASCIA ILI'ACA, Il'iac aponeuro'sis. An aponeurosis which proceeds from the tendon of the psoas minor, or which arises from the anterior surface of the psoas magnus, when the former muscle does not exist. It is attached, externally, to the inner edge of the crest of the ilium, below, and anteriorly — on one side, to the crural arch, sending an expansion to the fascia transversalis; and on the other, continuous with the deep-seated lamina of the fascia lata, which forms the posterior paries of the crural canal. Within and behind, the fascia iliaca is attached to the brim of the pelvis, and is continuous with the aponeurosis, which M. Jules Cloquet has called Pelvian. The iliac aponeurosis covers the iliac and psoas muscles, which it separates from the peritoneum.

FASCIA INFUNDIB'ULIFORMIS, a funnel-shaped offset from the fascia transversalis, which is prolonged as a sheath upon the vas deferens and spermatic vessels as they pass out of the abdomen.

FASCIA INGUINALIS, Spica.

FASCIA LATA. A name given by anatomists to an aponeurosis, and to a muscle.

FASCIA LATA APONEUROSIS, F. aponeurot'ica fem'oris, Vagi'na fem'oris, Crural or Fem'oral Aponeurosis, is the most extensive in the body, and envelopes all the muscles of the thigh. Above, it is attached to the outer edge of the ilia; before. it arises from the crural arch by two distinct laminæ, separated by the femoral vessels, and becoming confounded a little below the part where the great vena saphœna opens into the crural vein. Of these two laminæ, the one is more anterior and thicker than the other, and may be considered as a prolongation of the aponeurosis of the external oblique. It is intimately united to Poupart's ligament. The other, which is thinner, is behind, and deeper seated, and, after its union with the former, proceeds to be inserted into the pubis. Inferiorly, the fascia lata becomes confounded with the tendon of the triceps, and is attached to the external tuberosity of the tibia. The use of the fascia lata, like that of other aponeuroses, is to strengthen the action of the muscles, &c.

Fascia Lata Muscle, Tensor vagi'næ fem'oris, Fascia'lis, Membrano'sus, Mus'culus aponeuro'sis seu fasciæ latæ seu fem'oris membrano'sus, (F.) Ilio-aponévrosi-fémoral, Ilio-aponévroti-fémoral—(Ch.), Tenseur de l'aponévrose fémorale. A muscle, situate at the upper and outer part of the thigh. It arises, above, from the outer part of the anterior and superior spine of the ilium; and is inserted, below, between the two laminæ of the fascia lata, which it stretches and raises when it contracts.

Fascia Pro'pria. A layer of areolar tissue derived from the sheath of the femoral vessels,—or according to some from the cribriform fascia. It is one of the coverings of femoral hernia, and is generally pretty dense about the neck of the hernia; but thin or even wanting on its fundus.

Fascia, Subperito'neal, Subperitone'al aponeuro'sis. A thin tendinous layer on the outer surface of the peritoneum.

Fascia Superficia'lis, Superficial aponeuro'sis of the abdomen and thigh, (F.) Aponévrose superficielle de l'abdomen et de la cuisse. A very thin aponeurosis, which covers the muscles and aponeuroses of the abdomen; passes before the crural arch, to which it adheres with some degree of force; sends a membranous sheath, which surrounds the spermatic cord; and is continuous with the dartos, which it assists in forming. The fascia superficialis presents, beneath the crural arch, very distinct fibres, whose direction is parallel to the fold of the thigh. It is applied over the fascia lata aponeurosis, and is attached, internally, to the ascending ramus of the ischium, near the root of the corpus cavernosum. Before the descent of the testicle from the abdomen, the fascia superficialis is very manifestly continuous with the Gubernaculum testis.

Fascia Tformis, T. bandage—f. Tortilis, Tourniquet.

Fascia Transversa'lis, F. Coop'eri. An aponeurosis, which separates the transversalis muscle from the peritoneum in the inguinal region. It arises above the posterior edge of the crural arch, where it seems to be continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle. Above, it is lost in the areolar tissue at the internal surface of the transversalis abdominis. Within, it is continuous with the outer edge of the tendon of the rectus muscle and Gimbernat's ligament; below, it is continuous with the aponeurosis of the greater oblique, and receives an expansion from the Fascia Iliaca. Towards its middle and a little above the crural arch, the fascia transversalis has the wide orifice of a canal, which is occupied, in the female, by the round ligament of the uterus; and, in man, furnishes an expansion, that serves as a sheath to the spermatic vessels.

(F.) Fascicule, Faisceau ou Petit Faisceau, Trousseau. In Pharmacy, it means manip'ulus, Cheiroplethes, χειροπλήθης, 'a handful.' Fat, Pingue'do, Pim'elē, Piar, Pici'ron, Lipos, Stear, Adeps, Sevum, Sebum, Corpus adipo'sum, Axun'gia, Fat, (F.) Graisse: from (G.) Fett, (Sax.) fæt. A soft, white, animal substance; inodorous; insipid; oily; inflammable, easy to melt; spoiling in the air, and becoming rancid by union with oxygen: almost insoluble in alcohol; insoluble in water; soluble in fixed oils. Fat is formed of the immediate principles, stearin, margarin, and olein or elain, all of which are regarded as salts composed of stearic, margaric and oleic acids, and a common base, to which, from its sweetish taste, the name Glyc''erin Glyceri'na, Glyceri'num, (F.) Glycérine has been given. To these are, almost always, joined an odorous and a colouring principle. Glycerin. Glyceri'na, has been introduced into the last edition of the Pharmacopœia of the U. S. (1851), in which it is directed to be prepared as follows:—Lead plaster, recently prepared and yet fluid; boiling water, of each a gallon; mix: stir briskly for 15 minutes; allow it to cool and pour off the liquid. Evaporate until it has the s. g. 1.15, and pass slowly through it a current of sulpho-hydric acid until a black precipitate is no longer thrown down. Filter and boil until the sulpho-hydric acid is driven off, and evaporate the liquid until it ceases to lose weight. Glycerin is a colourless or straw-coloured syrupy fluid; s. g. 1.25. It is soluble in water and in alcohol, but not in ether. It is used in the form of lotion, composed of half an ounce to ten fluidounces of water, in cutaneous diseases, as psoriasis, pityriasis, lepra and ichthyosis. It forms a kind of varnish, and might be useful in cases of burns.

Fat is found in a number of animal tissues, and is very abundant in the neighborhood of the kidneys and in the epiploon. It is generally fluid in the cetacea; soft, and of a strong smell in the carnivora; solid, and inodorous in the ruminating animal; white, and abundant in young animals; and yellowish in old. It generally forms about a twentieth part of the weight of the human body. The fat, considered physiologically, has, for its function, to protect the organs; maintain their temperature; and to serve for nutrition in case of need; as is observed in torpid animals.

FATIGUE, Copos.

FATTY, Adipo'sus, Adipa'tus, Pimel'icus, Pimelo'des, Liparo'des, Lip'arus, Sax. fæt; past participle of feðan, to feed, Ad'ipous, Pinguid, Pinguid'inous. Relating to fat. Resembling or containing fat. The cellular membrane has been called fatty or adipous; from an opinion that, in its areolæ, the fat is deposited. The areolar membrane, however, merely lodges, between its lamellæ and filaments, the vesicles in which the fat is contained.

Fatty Lig'ament, Ad'ipous ligament. This name has been given to a reflection of the synovial membrane of the knee joint, which passes from the ligamentum patellæ towards the cavity that separates the condyles of the femur.

Fatty Membrane, Ad'ipous membrane, Adipous tissue. The subcutaneous areolar tissue, or that containing the fatty or adipous vesicles.

Fatty Ves'icles, Sac'uli adipo'si, Ad'ipous vesicles, Fat cells. This name is given to small bursæ or membranous vesicles which enclose the fat, and are found situate in the areolæ of the areolar tissue. These vesicles vary much in size. Generally, they are round and globular; and, in certain subjects, receive vessels which are very apparent. They form so many small sacs without apertures, in the interior of which are filaments arranged like septa. In fatty subjects, the adipous vesicles are very perceptible, being attached to the areolar tissue and neighbouring parts by a vascular pedicle. Raspail affirms that there is the most striking analogy between the nature of the adipose granules and that of the amylaceous grains.

Fatty Vessels, Ad'ipous vessels. The vessels connected with the fat. Some anatomists have called Adipous canals, (F.) Conduits adipeux, the vessels to which they attribute the secretion of fat.

FEET, BURNING OF THE. A singular cachectic disease, described by Mr. Malcolmson as occurring in India, the prominent symptom of which was a sense of burning in the feet.

FÉGARITE, Cancer aquaticus, Stomatitis, pseudo-membranous.

FEIGNED DISEASES, Morbi dissimula'ti seu simula'ti seu cela'ti seu infitia'ti seu pseudala'lei, Sim'ulated or Pretend'ed diseases, (F.) Maladies dissimulées ou simulées ou feintes ou supposées. The tricks employed, by impostors, to induce a belief that they are attacked with diseases when they are not. These are generally assumed by beggars to obtain alms; by criminals to escape punishment; and by soldiers to be exempt from duty.

The following table exhibits the chief feigned diseases, with the means of detection:

A TABLE OF FEIGNED, PRETENDED, SIMULATED, OR EXCITED DISEASES OR DISQUALIFICATIONS.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
1. Abortion.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.
2. Abstinence.	.....	By constant and minute attention.
3. Amaurotic Blindness.	By applying the extract of belladonna or datura stramonium to the eye.	Amaurosis is characterized by dilated pupil. Where these substances have been applied, the effects will go off in ten days or a fortnight.
4. Apoplexy.	By falling down as if deprived of sensation and consciousness.	By powerful stimulants; an electric shock; application of hot water, sternutatories, actual cautery, &c.
5. Cachexia, Anæmia, and Debility.	Using substances to make the face appear pale and livid. Indulging freely in wine, and privation of sleep prior to examination.	By examining if the pulse be strong, and the skin hot, and whether there be loss of appetite or of strength, or swelling of the limbs.
6. Excretion of Calculi.	Putting sand, pebbles, &c., into the urine.	By the aid of chymistry. We are acquainted with the chymical composition of urinary calculi.
7. Cancerous Ulcer.	By gluing on a portion of a spleen with the smooth side to the skin, leaving on the outside the appearance of an ulcerated surface.	By noticing whether there be signs of cachexia, and by attentive examination of the part.
8. Catalepsy.	By seeming to be suddenly motionless, the joints remaining flexible, and external objects making no impression.	By powerful stimulants, as recommended under apoplexy. Letting fall a drop of boiling water on the back. Proposing to use the actual cautery, and seeing whether the pulse rises.
9. Chorea.	By assuming the convulsive motions of a part which characterize chorea.	By examining the patient whilst he may imagine himself unobserved, and seeing whether the convulsive motions go on. By anæsthetics. (?)
10. Contraction of Joints in General	.....	Mode of discrimination sometimes so obscure as to deceive the most practised and attentive.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
11. Contraction of the Fingers.	.....	Introduce a cord between the fingers and the palm of the hand, and gradually apply weights so as to expand the fingers. Confine him so that he cannot obtain his food without using his clenched hand.
12. Convulsions.	.....	When feigned, they do not present the rigidity of muscles or the rapidity of action which characterize the real. The mode of detection must be the same as in epilepsy.
13. Opake Cornea.	Produced by the application of a strong acid, by acrid powders, as quicklime, &c.	The existence of the opacity can be detected by attentive observation.
14. Cutaneous Diseases.	Some articles of diet will bring on urticaria or nettle-rash, in particular individuals, as shell-fish, bitter almonds, &c. By acrids, acids, or any irritants applied to the surface. An ointment of tartarized antimony causes a painful pustular eruption. See Porrigo, in this list.	By careful examination on the part of practitioner and nurse.
15. Deaf-Dumbness.	.....	The really deaf and dumb acquire an expression of countenance and gestures which it is difficult to assume.
16. Deafness.	It may be assumed or excited by putting a pea in the ear, or by inserting irritants, so as to induce inflammation and temporary loss of function.	Make a noise when not expected, and see if the countenance varies or pulse rises. Put to sleep by opium, and then fire a pistol close to the ear, when he may be thrown off his guard. Examine the ear to see if any trick has been played there.
17. Death.	Some persons possess the power of suspending or moderating the action of the heart.	If suspected, the plan recommended under apoplexy will be found most efficacious.
18. Debility, see Cachexia.
19. Deformity.	.....	Examine the part and its articulation, naked, and compare it with the opposite.
20. Delivery.	After enlargement produced artificially, a subsidence of the tumefaction; the parts being moistened by borrowed blood, and the child of another substituted as the female's own.	Can only be positively detected by examination per vaginam. Soon after delivery, the vagina will be relaxed and the lochial discharge be flowing in greater abundance, the shorter the time that may have elapsed since delivery.
21. Diarrhœa.	Said to have been caused by a mixture of vinegar and burnt cork. (?) May be occasioned by the use of any of the purgative roots, &c.	When diarrhœa is feigned by the lower classes, inspect the linen; if clean, the bowels are probably not much out of order. Let every individual have a close stool of his own; and inspect the evacuations, taking care that one suffering under the disease does not lend his evacuations to another.
22. Dropsy.	May be feigned, like pregnancy, by wearing pads. The anasarcous condition of the lower limbs has been caused by applying a ligature round them. By inflating the cellular membrane of the abdomen.	Can be detected by attentive examination. There will be a want of that leucophlegmatic habit which accompanies and characterizes dropsy.
23. Dysentery.	May be feigned, like diarrhœa, by adding a little blood to the evacuations, or by introducing a soap or some more irritating suppository.	Same rules as under diarrhœa.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
24. Epilepsy.	The foaming of the mouth has been produced by keeping a piece of soap in it.	Sensation in epilepsy is totally abolished. If any remain, disease probably feigned. Incontractility of pupil, which occurs in epilepsy, cannot be feigned. Same means to be used as in feigned apoplexy.
25. Fever.	By various stimulants, as wine, brandy, pepper; swallowing a small quantity of tobacco, or introducing it into the anus. Flour or chalk used to whiten the tongue. Redness of skin, caused by friction with a hard brush.	This deceit is generally developed by a day or two's examination. Where flour or chalk has been used to whiten the tongue, the line of demarcation between the whitened part and the clean, healthy margin of the tongue, is too well marked to escape observation.
26. Fistula in Ano.	By making an incision near the verge of the anus, and introducing into it an acrid tent, such as the root of white hellebore, &c.	By careful examination.
27. Fractures.	There is generally nothing but the man's own testimony. He complains of pain in the part; if fracture of the skull be feigned, he states, perhaps, that he becomes deranged on tasting liquor.	By attentive examination.
28. Hæmatemesis.	By drinking the blood of some animal, or using some coloured liquid, and then throwing it up.	By cutting off the supply of the fluid and careful examination.
29. Hæmoptysis.	By secreting bullock's blood for the purpose of colouring the saliva; making small incisions in the mouth; using bole armeniac or paint of vermilion.	Blood from the lungs is frothy and light-coloured. Mouth and fauces must be carefully inspected, and the individual be observed.
30. Hæmorrhoids.	By introducing bladders of rats or of small fish partly into the rectum. The linen has also been stained with borrowed blood.	The means are obvious.
31. Heart, Diseases of, see Palpitation.
32. Hepatitis.	.....	Unless the person be a well-educated impostor, acute inflammation of the liver will be detected by the absence of marks of strong inflammatory action. Chronic liver disease is, frequently, not characterized by well-marked symptoms, and hence, when assumed, is difficult of detection.
33. Hernia.	In the same manner as hydrocele; —by inflation.	The detection is easy.
34. Hydrocele.	By puncturing the skin of the scrotum, and inflating the cellular membrane.	Do.
35. Hydrocephalus.	By opening the integuments of the head, near the vertex, e. g. and blowing in air.	Do.
36. Hysteria.	.....	Does not easily resist the application of strong sternutatories to the nostrils. Attentive examination necessary.
37. Insanity.	.....	The expression of countenance cannot easily be feigned. Nor can the affection be kept up so long as in real mental alienation. The individual cannot do so long without food, sleep, &c.
38 Jaundice.	By colouring the skin with an infusion of turmeric or tincture of rhubarb. Clay-coloured stools produced by taking daily a small quantity of muriatic acid. High-coloured urine by rhubarb taken internally.	The eyes cannot be coloured, although smoke has been used for this purpose. The skin must be washed to remove the colouring matter if any exist, and the supply of acid and rhubarb be prevented.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
39. Lameness.	By keeping the limb in a contracted state, and resisting any efforts to move it.	By two persons taking hold of the individual and moving rapidly along with him; and when they are tired, having relays. The impostor will generally give in.
40. Menstruation.	By staining the clothes and body with borrowed blood.	By cutting off the supply.
41. Myopia. Short-Sightedness.	....	Present an open book, and apply the leaves close to the nose. If it cannot be read distinctly, when thus placed, or when glasses proper for short-sightedness are used, the disease is feigned.
42. Ophthalmia.	Excited by a variety of acrid and corrosive substances applied to the eye; as lime, &c. A portion of black muslin, spread over the cornea. The eyelashes are sometimes extracted, and caustic applied to excite disease in the palpebræ.	When ophthalmia is thus excited, its progress is ordinarily very rapid, arriving at its height within a few hours.
43. Ozæna.	By impregnating a piece of sponge with some offensive juices or oils, mixed with decayed cheese, and putting the imbued sponge into the nostrils.
44. Palpitation.	White hellebore, given in the dose of 10 or 12 grains, and repeated, will occasion general indisposition, and undue action of the heart.	Cut off the supply.
45. Pains.	.....	The detection is here often difficult. The non-existence of pain cannot be proved, and great pain may be present without any appearance externally. The imposition is more frequently detected by inconsistencies and contradictions in the patient's history of the case, than in any other manner.
46. Shaking Palsy.	.....	May be suspected, if the person be in an ordinary state of vigour. Try violent remedies and means, recommended under Chorea.
47. Paralysis.	.....	Violent remedies are here required. Cold affusion, actual cautery, electric shocks, &c.
48. Phthisis Pulmonalis.	Individuals with long necks and contracted shoulders have simulated phthisis, by covering the chest with blisters, cicatrices of issues, &c., and by taking drugs which cause paleness.	By attentive examination of the symptoms.
49. Polypus Nasi.	By introducing the testicle of a young cock, or the kidney of a rabbit, into the nostril, and retaining it there by means of a sponge fastened to it.
50. Porrigo. Scalled Head.	By applying nitric acid to the head, after protecting the face with fatty substances; but the chronic state is imitated by the use of depilatories of different kinds applied sometimes in patches, so as to resemble the Porrigo decalvans.
51. Pregnancy.	By wearing pads, and assuming the longing after particular articles of diet, &c.	By the absence of the areola; the presence of a pad; and, if necessary, by examination per vaginam.
52. Prolapsus Ani.	By a portion of the intestine of the ox, in which a sponge filled with a mixture of blood and milk is placed.
53. Prolapsus Uteri.	By a similar fraud.

Diseases, &c.	How Feigned.	How Detected.
54. Pulse, Weakness or Defect of.	By ligatures applied to the corresponding arm.	By examining whether the arteries of the two arms beat alike; and if a ligature be placed on the arm.
55. Chronic Rheumatism. See Pain.
56. Scrofula.	By exciting ulcers below the angles of the jaw.	By examining the general habit, and observing whether the ulcerations be glandular, and the discharge of a scrofulous character.
57. Scurvy.	By covering the teeth with wax, and then applying acid, corrosive substances to the gums.	By examining the general habit; whether debilitated, cachectic, and possessing the usual general signs of scorbutus.
58. Stammering.	.....	Simulators of this defect generally state, that it is connate, or ascribe it to a fit of apoplexy or severe fever. Where the organs of speech were perfect, and the moral evidence of the previous existence of the infirmity was not satisfactory, the French authorities used to confine the soldiers, and not supply them with food, until they called for it without stammering.
59. Stricture of the Urethra.	.....	By passing a bougie.
60. Swelling of the Legs.	By ligatures round the thighs.	Examine the limbs uncovered.
61. Syncope.	Ligatures are sometimes used to prevent the pulse being felt. By applying lotions to the face to make it pale.	By using sternutatories. By the absence of some of the symptoms of syncope. Examine the naked arms. Wash the face.
62. Tympany.	Persons have possessed the power of swallowing air, so as to distend the stomach, and simulate tympany.
63. Ulcer of the Ear.	By introducing a tent, imbued with blistering plaster into the ear, and repeating the application, until the tube becomes ulcerated, and a discharge of puriform matter is established. The fetid smell is imitated, by dropping into the ear a mixture of empyreumatic oil, asafœtida, and old cheese. Also, by introducing a little honey into the meatus.	By careful examination.
64. Ulcers of the Legs, &c.	By corrosives, or irritants. Sometimes by abrasion, by rubbing sand on the shin-bone. At others, they are pretended, by gluing on a piece of spleen or the skin of a frog.	Artificial ulcers have, usually, a more distinct margin, and are more readily healed than others; the latter being generally indicative of an impaired constitution.
65. Bloody Urine.	The fruit of the Indian Fig (Cactus opuntia) colours the urine as red as blood. Cantharides will cause it. Blood may also be procured and mixed with the urine.	By making the patient pass his urine in the presence of the physician, and examining the vessel before and after. By cutting off the supply of any substance, which could cause the appearance.
66. Incontinence of Urine.	.....	Difficult, at times, of detection. Give the person a full dose of opium, and introduce the catheter when he is asleep. If there be urine, the incontinence is feigned.
67. Varicose Veins.	By a ligature, placed tightly round the limb. They may be excited in this manner, or aggravated if already existing.	By examining the limb.

Ferri Protocar'bonas, Protocar'bonate of Iron, (F.) Carbonate de Fer. The protocarbonate of iron, thrown down from a solution of the sulphate of iron by the carbonate of soda, readily attracts oxygen and becomes converted into the sesquioxide. To prevent this, it may be associated with honey and sugar, and the mixture be reduced by evaporation to a pilular consistence. The mass constitutes the Ferru'ginous Pills, Pilules ferrugineuses, of Vallet, Vallet's Pills. See Pilulæ Ferri Carbonatis. The Edinburgh Pharmacopœia contains the Ferri Car'bonas Saccharu'tum, Ferri Car'bonas cum Sac'charo, Sac'charine Car'bonate of Iron, prepared in this manner. It is the Ferrum Carboni'icum Saccharatum of Klauer.

The protocarbonate is given in the same diseases as the lactate of iron; ten or fifteen grains in the course of the twenty-four hours.

It is very liable to become oxidated, and must be kept in a dry, well-stopped bottle. It has been prescribed in anæmic, and especially in chlorotic cases. The ordinary dose is three to six grains, or more, three times a day, in pill made with sugar and gum. A formula for its preparation is given in the last edition of the Pharmacopœia of the United States (1851).

Ferri et Qui'niæ Citras, Ferrum et Chini'num citri'cum, Citrate of Iron and Qui'nia, formed by the union of four parts of citrate of iron and one part of citrate of quinia, has been prescribed in cases where a combination of these tonics is indicated.

Specific gravity 7·600 to 7·800; hard, ductile, malleable, and magnetic. The medicinal virtues of iron are tonic; producing fetid eructations, when it takes effect, owing to its meeting with acid in the stomach, which oxidizes it, and causes the evolution of hydrogen gas. When given in the metallic state, the filings are chiefly used; but the oxides and salts are most commonly employed.

S.) seu Perox'ydum Hydra'tum, Ferru'go, Hydras Fer'ricus, Hydro-oxide of Iron, Hydra'ted peroxide of Iron, Hydrated Tritoxide of Iron. It may be prepared by taking a solution of sulphate of iron, increasing its dose of oxygen by heating it with nitric acid, and precipitating the oxide by adding pure ammonia in excess, washing the precipitate, and keeping it moist.

The following is the formula adopted by the Pharmacopœia of the United States: Ferri Sulph. ℥iv; acid. sulphuric. f℥iiiss; acid. nitric. f℥vi, vel q. s., Liq ammoniæ q. s., aquæ Oij. Dissolve the sulphate of iron in the water, and having added the sulphuric acid boil the solution: then add the nitric acid in small portions, boiling the liquid for a minute or two after each addition, until the acid ceases to produce a dark colour. Filter the liquid, allow it to cool, and add the liquor ammoniæ in excess, stirring the mixture briskly; wash the precipitate with water, until the washings cease to yield a precipitate with chloride of barium, and keep it close in bottles with water sufficient to cover it.

It has been brought forward as an antidote to arsenic; and many cases of its efficacy have been published.

From 10 to 20 parts of the hydrated oxide would seem to be more than sufficient to convert 1 part of arsenious acid into the basic salt of iron.

Mix the subcarbonate of iron and the muriatic acid, and digest for two hours; pour the solution into a gallon of the distilled water; set aside for an hour, and pour off the supernatant liquor. To this add the liquor potassæ; wash the precipitate formed frequently with water, and while yet moist, mix it with the bitartrate of potassa and half a gallon of the distilled water. Keep the mixture at the temperature of 140° for 30 hours, frequently stirring; filter the solution, and evaporate by means of a water bath, at the same temperature, to dryness.—(Ph. U. S.) It is one of the mildest of the salts of iron, and not unpalatable. Dose, gr. x. to ℥ss.

FEVER, Febris, from feritas, 'wildness,' or from fervor, 'heat,' or from februo, 'I purify:' Pyr, Pyr'etos, πυρετος, (F.) Fièvre. One of the most frequent and dangerous affections to which the body is liable. A person has an attack of fever, when he is affected with rigors, followed by increased heat of skin, quick pulse, languor, and lassitude. Rigors, increased heat, and frequency of pulse have each been assumed as the essential character of fever. It is not characterized, however, by any one, but depends upon the coexistence of many symptoms. Fevers have been usually divided into idiopathic or essential, and into symptomatic. The idiopathic arise without any obvious local cause. The symptomatic are dependent upon local irritation. Idiopathic fevers may be divided into three classes: 1. Those attended with distinct paroxysms:—intermittents. 2. Remittent and continued fevers: and, 3. Fevers complicated with eruptions, or the exanthematous. These divisions admit of great variety, owing to climate, season, soil, age, &c. All ages and climates are liable to fever; and its exciting causes are very numerous. These causes may be common; as irritations in the intestines; external injuries, stimulants, &c.; or they may be specific; as miasmata, contagion, &c. The greatest diversity has prevailed regarding the theory of fever. Its primary seat has been placed in the brain, mucous membrane of the stomach and intestines, skin, nerves, blood-vessels, liver, vena cava, pancreas, &c. It would seem, however, that although, in fever, the whole of the functions are morbidly impressed, the arguments in favour of the impression being first made on the nervous system and the system of nutrition are the strongest. The exciting cause of fever, whatever it may be, produces an irregular action in the system of nutrition, which is soon conveyed to the rest of the system, owing to the extensive sympathy which exists between every part of the body; and it is probable, that all those local inflammations and congestions are the consequence, rather than the cause, of this disordered condition of the system. The general character of fever is clearly shown by examination of the blood. When fever is devoid of inflammatory complication, the quantity of fibrin is in no case augmented. It frequently remains in the healthy proportion, and at times diminishes to an extent not met with in any other acute disease. The alteration of the blood in fevers, which consists generally in a diminution of the fibrinous element, is the reverse of what occurs in inflammation.

Many phenomena of fever are influenced by that periodicity, which we notice in the execution of several of the functions of the body. The types of intermittents are strong evidences of such an influence.

In the treatment of fever, it is important to bear in mind, 1. Its tendency, particularly in the case of the exanthemata, to run a definite course, and terminate in restoration to health. 2. The disposition to local determination or hyperæmia:—the most frequent cause of the fatal termination of fever; a circumstance requiring the vigilant attention of the physician. 3. That the symptoms must be attentively studied, in order to deduce, as far as possible from them, the indications of cure. Lastly, attention must be paid to the prevalent epidemic. There are particular seasons in which fevers are very malignant; and others in which they are as mild; circumstances which necessarily have an effect upon the treatment.

A very acute and dangerous febrile affection; so called, because complicated, in its second stage, with a jaundiced appearance, accompanied by vomiting of black matter. Sauvages, Cullen, and others regard it as a variety of typhus; and Pinel, as a species of gastro-adynamic, or bilious putrid fever. It occurs, endemically, only within the tropics; but it has been met with epidemically in the temperate regions. Broussais regards the disease as gastro-enteritis, exasperated by atmospheric heat; so that it runs through its stages with much greater rapidity than the gastro-enteritis of our climates. The yellow colour of the skin, according to him, is owing to the inflammation of the small intestine,—and especially of the duodenum, — augmenting the secretion of the liver, and at the same time preventing its discharge into the duodenum. The pathology of this affection, as well as its origin, is still unsettled. The treatment must generally be of the most active nature at the onset; consisting in bleeding largely, and exhibiting mercury, so as to excite a new action, if possible; — the other symptoms being combated according to general principles. It must vary, however, according to the epidemic.

FIBRE, Fibra, Is, Ctedon, Filum. An organic filament, of a solid consistence, and more or less extensible, which enters into the composition of every animal and vegetable texture. The simple or elementary fibre of the ancients, from a particular assemblage and arrangement of which every texture of the body was conceived to be constituted, seems entirely ideal. The moderns usually admit, with Haller and Blumenbach, three elementary fibres or tissues. 1. The cellular or laminated, formed chiefly of thin plates, of a whitish colour and extensible, which seems to consist of concrete gelatin. 2. The nervous, pulpy, or medullary, formed of a soft substance, contained in a cellular sheath, and consisting of albumen united to a fatty matter. 3. The muscular, composed of round filaments, of a grayish or reddish colour, and formed of fibrin. Chaussier has added to these the albugineous fibre, but it seems to differ from the cellular fibre only in greater condensation of the molecules. See Fibrons.

A very small or ultimate fibre is called a Fibril, Fibril'la.

FI'BRIN or Fib'rin, Fibrine, Fibri'na, Fibri'nē, Fibra san'guinis, Mate'ria fibro'sa, Lympha plas'tica, Matière fibreuse du sang. An immediate animal principle — solid, white, and inodorous; insipid; heavier than water; without action on the vegetable blues; elastic, when moist; hard and brittle when dry. It enters into the composition of the chyle and the blood, and forms the chief part of the muscles of red-blooded animals. Muscular fibrin, Syntonin, Musculin, has been shown, however, to be different from that of the blood. In certain diseased actions, Fibrin or Coagulable lymph, gluten, is separated from the blood, and is found in considerable quantity on the surfaces of membranes, and in the cavities of the body. See Liquor Sanguinis.

Fibrin is likewise a proximate principle of vegetables, and differs but little in chemical composition from animal fibrin; nor does it differ much from albumen and casein.

Fibrin is very nutritious.

FIBRINA'TION, Fibrina'tio. The act of adding fibrin to the blood. The opposite to defibrination.

FIBRO-CAR'TILAGE, Fibro-cartila'go. An organic tissue, partaking of the nature of the fibrous tissue, and of that of cartilage. It is dense, resisting, elastic, firm, supple, and flexible. Fibro-cartilages are distinguished into,—1. Membraniform, or those which serve as moulds to certain parts, as the alæ nasi and eyelids. 2. Vaginiform, or those which form sheaths for the sliding of tendons. 3. Interarticular, those which are met with in the movable articulations. 4. Uniting. (F.) Fibro-cartilages d'union, which form a junction between two bones, as the symphysis pubis. Fibro-cartilages are sometimes formed adventitiously, as the result of a morbid process in different organs.

The fibrous system of Bichat includes the system of organs formed by the albugineous fibre of Chaussier. It comprises, particularly, the periosteum and perichondrium; the articular capsules and ligaments; the tendons; the dura mater, pericardium, tunica sclerotica, tunica albuginea testis, outer membrane of the spleen, &c. Under simple fibrous tissues, Telæ fibro'sæ, certain writers have classed the white and yellow fibrous tissues, and areolar tissue. Both the yellow and the white may be detected in the areolar tissue. The white is said to exist alone in ligaments, tendons, fibrous membranes, aponeuroses, &c. The yellow, (F.) Tissu jaune, exists separately in the middle coat of the arteries, the chordæ vocales, ligamentum nuchæ of quadrupeds, &c. It differs from the white in possessing a high degree of elasticity, owing to the presence of a distinct principle, called by MM. Robin and Verdeil, élasticine.

It is articulated with the tibia. Its inferior or tarsal extremity is broader than the superior. It is articulated with the tibia and astragalus, and forms the malleolus externus or outer ankle by means of its coronoid process. The body of the bone has three faces, having more or less prominent edges. It is separated from the tibia by the interosseous space, and is developed by three points of ossification; one at the body, and one at each extremity. It prevents the foot from turning outwards.

FIS'TULA, 'a pipe or reed,' Syrinx, Syrin'ga, Aulos — when of a small size, Aulis'cos. A solution of continuity, of greater or less depth and sinuosity; the opening of which is narrow, and the disease kept up by an altered texture of parts, so that it is not disposed to heal. A fistula is incomplete or blind, when it has but one opening; and complete when there are two, the one communicating with an internal cavity, the other externally. It is lined, in its whole course, by a membrane which seems analogous to mucous membranes. Incomplete fistulæ may be internal or external. The former are those which open internally; the latter those which open externally. External incomplete fistulæ are kept up by caries or necrosis of bones, by extraneous bodies in any of the living textures, or by purulent cavities, the walls of which have not become united. Internal incomplete fistulæ generally soon become complete, since the discharge that escapes from them into the cavities into which they open has a constant tendency to make its way outwardly, and soon occasions ulceration of the integuments. Fistulæ have received different names, according to the discharge which they afford, and the organs in which they are seated,—as lachrymal, biliary, salivary, synovial, urinary — Fis'tula uri'næ, U'rias. The great object of treatment, in fistulous sores, is to bring on an altered condition of the parietes of the canal, by astringent or stimulating injections, caustics, the knife, pressure, &c. Those which are dependent on diseased bone, cartilage, tendon, &c., do not heal until after the exfoliation of the diseased part. Fistulæ of excretory ducts are produced either by an injury of the duct itself or by the retention and accumulation of the fluids to which they have to give passage. Thus, Fis'tula lacryma'lis, Dacryosyr'inx, Emphrag'ma lacryma'lē, Hydrops sacci lacryma'lis, Dropsy of the lachrymal sac, commonly proceeds from the obliteration of the nasal ducts, or from atony of the lachrymal sac; which circumstances prevent the tears from passing into the nostrils.

FISTULA IN ANO, Archosyr'inx, generally occurs from some mechanical pressure or impediment. The principal indication in the treatment of these fistulæ of the excretory canals being to put a stop to the constant discharge of the secretions, &c., through the preternatural channel, the fistulous passage is at times laid open, and a communication established with the natural excretory canal; at others, strong pressure is employed to procure its obliteration.

FŒTAL, Fœta'lis. Relating to the fœtus. A name given to the parts connected with the fœtus. Thus we say—the fœtal surface of the placenta, in contradistinction to the uterine or maternal surface.

FŒTAL CIRCULATION differs from that of the adult in several respects. Commencing with the placenta, where it probably undergoes some change analogous to what occurs in the lungs in extrauterine existence, the blood proceeds by the umbilical vein as far as the liver, where a part of it is poured into the vena porta; the other proceeds into the vena cava inferior; the latter, having received the suphrahepatic veins, pours its blood into the right auricle. From the right auricle, a part of the blood is sent into the right ventricle; the rest passes directly through into the left auricle, by the foramen ovale. When the right ventricle contracts, the blood is sent into the pulmonary artery; but as the function of respiration is not going on, no more blood passes to the lungs than is necessary for their nutrition; the remainder goes directly through the ductus arteriosus into the aorta. The blood, received by the left auricle from the lungs, as well as that which passed through the foramen ovale, is transmitted into the left ventricle; by the contraction of which it is sent into the aorta, and by means of the umbilical arteries, which arise from the hypogastric, it is returned to the placenta.

Fœtal Head. The diameters of this at the full period are as follows:—1. The Biparietal or transverse, extending from one parietal protuberance to the other, and measuring 3½ inches. 2. The Temporal, from one temple to another, 3 inches. 3. The Occipito-mental, from the occiput to the chin; the greatest of all, 5 inches. 4. The Occipito-frontal or antero-posterior, 4¼ or 4½ inches. 5. The Cervico-bregmatic, from the nape of the neck to the centre of the anterior fontanelle. 6. The Fronto-mental, from the forehead to the chin, about 3½ inches. 7. The Trachelo-bregmatic, from the front of the neck to the anterior fontanelle, 3½ inches. 8. The Vertical diameter, from the vertex to the base of the cranium.

Fœtal Nutrition, Cyotrophy.

FŒTATION, Pregnancy.

FŒTICIDE, Fœticid'ium, from fœtus, and cædere, 'to kill;' Aborticid'ium. Criminal abortion.

FŒTIDUS, Fetid.

Fœtor Alarum. The disagreeable rank odour exhaled from the axillæ.

Fœtor Oris, Breath, offensive.

FŒTUS, Fetus, Cye'ma, Onus ventris, Sar'cina. 'The young of any creature.' The unborn child. (F.) Fétus, Faix. By κυημα, Cye'ma, Hippocrates meant the fecundated, but still imperfect, germ. It corresponded with the term embryo, as now used; whilst εμβρυον, 'embryo,' signified the fœtus at a more advanced stage of the utero-gestation. The majority of anatomists apply to the germ the name embryo, which it retains until the third month of gestation, and with some until the period of quickening; whilst fœtus is applied to it in its latter stages. The terms are, however, often used indiscriminately. When the ovule has been fecundated in the ovarium, it proceeds slowly towards, and enters the uterus, with which it becomes ultimately connected by means of the placenta. When first seen, the fœtus has the form of a gelatinous flake, which some have compared to an ant, a grain of barley, a worm curved upon itself, &c. The fœtal increment is very rapid in the first, third, fourth, and sixth months of its formation, and at the end of nine months it has attained its full dimensions — Enfant à terme. Generally, there is but one fœtus in utero; sometimes, there are two; rarely three. The fœtus presents considerable difference in its shape, weight, length, situation in the womb, proportion of its various parts to each other, arrangement and texture of its organs, state of its functions at different periods of gestation, &c. All these differences are important in an obstetrical and medico-legal point of view. The following table exhibits the length and weight of the fœtus at different periods of gestation, on the authority of different observers. Their discordance is striking. It is proper to remark, that the Paris pound — Poid de Marc — of 16 ounces, contains 9216 Paris grains, whilst the avoirdupois contains only 8532,5 Paris grains, and that the Paris inch is 1.065977 English inch.

A simple fracture is when the bone only is divided. A compound fracture is a division of the bone with a wound of the integuments communicating with the bone,—the bone, indeed, generally protruding. In a com'minuted fracture, Alphite'don, αλφιτηδον, Carye'don Catag'ma, καρυηδον καταγμα, the bone is broken into several pieces; and in a complicated fracture there is, in addition to the injury done to the bone, a lesion of some considerable vessel, nervous trunk, &c. Fractures are also termed transverse, oblique, &c., according to their direction. The treatment of fractures consists, in general, in reducing the fragments when displaced; maintaining them when reduced; preventing the symptoms which may be likely to arise; and combating them when they occur. The reduction of fractures must be effected by extension, counter-extension, and coaptation. The parts are kept in apposition by position, rest, and an appropriate apparatus. The position must vary according to the kind of fracture. Commonly, the fractured limb is placed on a horizontal or slightly inclined plane, in a state of extension; or rather in a middle state between extension and flexion, according to the case.

FRACTURE, CAMERATED, Camerosis—f. en Rave, Raphanedon.

FRACTURE OF THE RADIUS, BARTON'S, Barton's fracture. A term applied to a fracture of the lower extremity of the radius, which commences at the articular surface, and extends upwards for an inch or more, to terminate on the dorsal aspect. Owing to the extensor muscles drawing up the separated portion of the bone, and with it the carpus, a deformity results, which has been confounded with simple dislocation. In consequence of the fracture having been well described by Dr. John Rhea Barton, of Philadelphia, it is often called after him.

FRÆNUM LINGUÆ, Præ'nulum seu Vin'culum Linguæ, Glossodes'mus, File'tum, (F.) Filet ou Frein de la langue, is a triangular reflection, formed by the mucous membrane of the mouth, and situate between the inferior paries of that cavity and the inferior surface of the tongue.

When the frænum extends as far as the extremity of the tongue, it cramps its movements, interferes with sucking, &c. This inconvenience is remedied by carefully snipping it with a pair of scissors. The French call this l'opération du filet.

FRÆNUM PENIS, F. seu Fræ'nulum seu Vin'culum Præpu'tii, F. Glandis, Cynodes'mion, Cynodes'mus, Vin'culum Cani'num, (F.) Filet ou Frein de la verge, is a membranous reflection which fixes the prepuce to the lower part of the glans. Pian of Amer'ica, Frambœ'sia America'na, Anthra'cia Bu'bula Americana, occurs under similar circumstances with the next, and seems to be transmitted by copulation. The tumours have a similar form, and are greater in proportion to their paucity. In some cases they are mixed with ulcers.

Pian of Guin'ea, Frambœ'sia Guineen'sis, Anthra'cia Ru'bula Guineen'sis, is common amongst the negroes, especially in childhood and youth. It begins by small spots, which appear on different parts, and especially on the organs of generation and around the anus; these spots disappear, and are transformed into an eschar, to which an excrescence succeeds, that grows slowly, and has the shape above described.

The treatment is nearly the same in the two varieties. The tumours will yield to mercurial friction, when small. When large, they must be destroyed by caustic. In both cases, mercury must be given to prevent a recurrence.

An endemic disease resembling yaws was observed in the Feejee Islands by the medical officers of the United States' Exploring Expedition. It is called by the natives Dthoke.

It forms the vault of the orbit; lodges the ethmoid bone in a notch at its middle part; and is articulated, besides, with the sphenoid, parietal, and nasal bones, the ossa unguis, superior maxillary, and malar bones.

FRONTAL FURROW extends upwards from the frontal spine, and becomes gradually larger in its course, to lodge the upper part of the superior longitudinal sinus, and to give attachment to the falx cerebri.

FRONTAL NERVE, Palpébro-frontal—(Ch.), is the greatest of the three branches of the ophthalmic nerve,—the first division of the 5th pair. It proceeds along the superior paries of the orbit, and divides into two branches:—the one, internal, which makes its exit from the orbitar fossa, passing beneath the pulley of the oblique muscle:—the other, external, issuing from the same cavity by the foramen orbitarium superius.

FRONTAL PROTU'BERANCE, F. tuberos'ity, Tuber fronta'lē, Suggrun'dium supercilio'rum. The protuberance of the frontal bone above the superciliary arch.

FRONTAL SPINE, Crista inter'na, is situate in the middle of the under part of the bone, and is formed by the coalescence of the inner tables for the attachment of the falx cerebri.

In a medical sense it may be defined to be:—that part of a plant which is taken as food. The effects of fruits on the body, in a medical as well as a dietetical point of view, are various. They may be distinguished into classes: for, whilst the Cerealia, for example, afford fruits, which are highly nutritious; the Summer Fruits (Fructus Horæi,) which include strawberries, cherries, currents, mulberries, raspberries, figs, grapes, &c., are refrigerant and grateful, but afford little nourishment.

It has been said to be a useful assistant to sea-water, in the cure of disorders of the glands. When the wrack, in fruit, is dried, cleaned, exposed to a red-heat in a crucible with a perforated lid, and is reduced to powder, it forms the Æthiops vegetabʼilis—the Pulvis Quercûs Mariʼnæ of the Dublin Pharmacopœia—which is used, like the burnt sponge, in bronchocele and other scrofulous swellings. FUNAMBULA'TIO, from funis, 'a cord,' and ambulare, 'to walk.' An exercise with the ancients, which consisted in scaling ropes.

FUNC'TION, Func'tio, Ac'tio, (F.) Fonction; from fungor, functus, 'I act,' 'perform.' The action of an organ or system of organs. Any act, necessary for accomplishing a vital phenomenon. A function is a special office in the animal economy, which has, as its instrument, an organ or apparatus of organs. Thus respiration is a function. Its object is the conversion of venous into arterial blood, and its instrument is the lungs. The ancient physiologists divided the functions into vital, animal, and natural. They called vital functions those which are essential to life, as innervation, circulation, respiration; animal functions, those which belong to the encephalon; viz.: the functions of the intellect, the affections of the mind, and the voluntary motions; and natural functions, Faculta'tes seu Actio'nes natura'les, those relating to assimilation, such as the actions of the abdominal viscera, of the absorbent and exhalant vessels, &c. Bichat divided the functions into those which relate to the preservation of the individual, and those that relate to the preservation of the species. The former he subdivided into animal and organic. The animal functions or functions of relation are those of the intellect, sensation, locomotion, and voice. The organic functions include digestion, absorption, respiration, circulation, secretion, nutrition, and calorification. The functions, whose object is the preservation of the species—the organic, nutritive, or vegetative functions — are all those that relate to generation;—such as conception, gestation, accouchement, &c. Each of these admits of numerous subdivisions in a complete course of Physiology;—for so the doctrine of the functions is called.

FUNC'TIONAL, Functiona'lis, (F.) Fonctionnel. Relating or belonging to the function of an organ, or to the functions in general.

Functional or vital phenomena are those produced by some modification in the action of an organ or organs, in contradistinction to those of a material or physical character;—thus we distinguish the functional phenomena of phthisis from those indicated by physical diagnosis—the physical phenomena.

In such case it has, also, been called Mentonnière, because placed beneath the chin; from (F.) Menton, 'the chin.'

The fungosities which arise in wounds or ulcers are easily repressed by gentle compression, dry lint, the sulphas cupri, or other gentle caustics. At times, the more powerful are necessary, and sometimes excision is required.

FUNGUS, Mycee, (σφογγος,) (F.) Fongus, Champignon. The mushroom order of plants; class Cryptogamia, in the Linnæan system. In Pathology, the word is commonly used synonymously with fungosity, myco'sis. M. Breschet has proposed to restrict the term fungosity to vegetations which arise on denuded surfaces, and to apply the term fungus to the tumours which form in the substance of the textures, without any external ulceration. Fici and warts, for example, would be fungi of the skin.

A series of phenomena, consisting in sensible movements, executed by animal parts, which are endowed with irritability, when placed in connexion with two metallic plates of different nature, between which a communication is established by direct contact or by means of a metallic wire. Galvanism has been employed medicinally in the same cases as electricity, and especially in neuralgic affections. It is often applied in the form of plates,—"Mansford's plates." In asthma, for example, a small blister, the size of a dollar, may be placed on the neck over the course of the phrenic and pneumogastric nerves, and another on the side, in the region of the diaphragm. One metal is placed mediately or immediately over the vesicated surface on the neck, and another over that in the side. They are then connected by means of a wire. The new nervous impression, in this way induced, is often signally beneficial.

GANG'LION, Gang'lium. In anatomy, a name generally given to a knot-like enlargement in the course of a nerve. It is applied, however, to organs differing considerably from each other in size, colour, texture, functions, &c. They are divided into glandiform, lymphatic, and nervous. 1. Glandiform ganglions, called also adenoid, vascular, and sanguineous ganglions; blind, aporic, ductless, blood, and vascular glands; glandulæ spuriæ, &c., are organs of whose functions we are, in general, ignorant; and which have the appearance of glands. They are formed of agglomerated globules, pervaded by blood-vessels surrounded by areolar membrane, and contain a milky or yellowish fluid. To this class belong the spleen, thymus, thyroid, and supra-renal glands. They are, doubtless, concerned in sanguification. 2. Lymphat'ic ganglions. See Conglobate. 3. Nervous ganglions, Ganglia seu Ganglio'nes seu Nodi seu Nod'uli Nervo'rum, Tumo'res seu Plexus ganglioform'es, Plexus glandifor'mes, Tuber'cula nodo'sa Nervo'rum, Divertic'ula spirituum anima'lium, Ganglia of increase, Form'ative gang'lia. Enlargements or knots in the course of a nerve. They belong, in general, to the system of the great sympathetic. One exists on the posterior root of every spinal nerve, and on one cerebral,—the 5th. Bichat regarded them as so many small brains, or centres of nervous action, independent of the encephalon, and intended exclusively for organic life. Being formed by the union of the cerebral and spinal nerves, they may send out the influence of both these nervous centres to the parts to which the nerves proceeding from them are distributed. Ganglia are chiefly composed of vesicular neurine; and appear to be concerned in the formation and dispensation of nerve power.

GANGLION, (γαγγλιον, Aëtius.) Same etymon. Emphy'ma encys'tis ganglion. A globular, hard, indolent tumour, without change in the colour of the skin; of a size varying from that of a pea, to that of an egg, and always situate in the course of a tendon. The tumour is formed of a viscid, albuminous fluid, contained in a cyst of greater or less thickness. The cyst is sometimes loose; but in the majority of cases it communicates, by a narrow footstalk, with the sheath of a tendon, or even with the synovial capsule of a neighbouring articulation. The causes are generally unknown. The treatment consists in compression, percussion, the use of discutients, extirpation, or incision.

GANGRENE, Gangræ'na, Cancre'na, Hot mortification, (F.) Gangrène, G. Chaude, Asphyxie des parties, from γραω, γραινω, 'I eat.' Privation of life or partial death of an organ. Authors have generally distinguished mortification into two stages; naming the first incipient or gangrene. It is attended with a sudden diminution of feeling in the part affected; livid discoloration; detachment of the cuticle, under which a turbid fluid is effused; with crepitation, owing to the disengagement of air into the areolar texture. When the part has become quite black, and incapable of all feeling, circulation, and life, it constitutes the second stage, or mortification, and is called sphac''elus. Gangrene, however, is frequently used synonymously with mortification,—local asphyxia being the term employed for that condition, in which the parts are in a state of suspended animation, and, consequently, susceptible of resuscitation. When the part is filled with fluid entering into putrefaction, the affection is called humid gangrene, (F.) Gangrène humide: on the other hand, when it is dry and shrivelled, it constitutes dry gangrene; (F.) Gangrène sèche. To this class belongs the gangræ'na seni'lis, G. Pot'tii, Presbyosphac''elus, or spontaneous gangrene of old people, which rarely admits of cure. Whatever may be the kind of gangrene, it may be caused by violent inflammation, contusion, a burn, congelation, the ligature of a large arterial trunk, or by some inappreciable internal cause.

The treatment, both of external and internal gangrene, varies according to the causes which produce it. Gangrene from excessive inflammation is obviated by antiphlogistics; and that from intense cold by cautiously restoring the circulation by cold frictions, &c. When the gangrene has become developed, the separation of the eschars must be encouraged by emollient applications, if there be considerable reaction; or by tonics and stimulants, if the reaction be insufficient.

That such a fluid is secreted, which concurs powerfully in digestion, is evident from many considerations, and has been positively proved by the author and numerous others. It was found by him to contain, in man chlorohydric and acetic acids. The gastric fluid in cases of sudden death sometimes corrodes and perforates the stomach; giving rise to interesting questions in medical jurisprudence.

It requires the most active treatment; —bleeding, blistering, fomentations, diluents, &c. Some degree of inflammation of the mucous coat of the stomach was considered by the followers of Broussais to be present in almost all fevers; and the various forms of dyspepsia have been supposed by some to be nothing more than chronic endogastri'tis.

GAZ, Gas, Air. Van Helmont first designated by this name,—the etymology of which is unknown,—the carbonic acid developed in the vinous fermentation. Afterwards, the term was appropriated to every permanently elastic fluid: that is, which preserves its aëriform state at all temperatures; and ultimately it was extended to all aëriform bodies;—which were divided into permanent and non-permanent gazes. The latter are generally termed vapours:—they return to the liquid state, when a portion of their caloric is abstracted. The permanent gazes, or gazes properly so called, are numerous, and may be divided into three sections with regard to their effects on the animal economy.

1. Irrespirable gazes.	Carbonic acid, ammoniacal gaz, chlorohydric acid gaz, deutoxide of azote, nitrous acid gaz, and chlorine.
2. Negatively deleterious gazes.	Hydrogen, azote.
3. Positively deleterious gazes.	Oxygen, protoxide of azote, carburetted hydrogen, carbonic oxide, sulphuretted hydrogen, and arseniuretted hydrogen.

It is proper to remark that the term respirable has been very differently employed by different writers. Sometimes it has meant the power of supporting life when applied to the blood in the lungs. At others, all gazes have been deemed irrespirable, which are incapable of being introduced into the lungs by voluntary efforts,—without any relation to their power of maintaining vitality; and this is perhaps the best sense. The gazes were, at one time, employed in medicine, under great expectations,—especially by the enthusiastic Beddoes; but they are now scarcely ever had recourse to. They differ, considerably, in their effects on the animal economy. Some, as oxygen, are exciting; others, as azote, depressing; whilst others, again, as the Protoxide of azote or laughing gas, produce the most singular effects.

GAZ DES BALLONS, Hydrogen.

GELATIG''ENOUS. A hybrid term, from gelatin, and γενω or γενναω, 'to engender.' That which forms gelatinous structure. Dr. Carpenter restricts the term to substances yielding gelatin. The propriety of this may well be questioned.

GEL'ATIN, Gel'atine, Gelat'ina, Galreda, (F.) Gélatine, from (F.) Gelée, 'gelly or jelly.' From (L.) Gelu, 'ice.' An immediate animal principle. It is semitransparent, insipid, inodorous, insoluble in cold water, very soluble in hot, which it thickens, and transforms into jelly on cooling. Gelatin is a nutritious substance; and, when dissolved in a considerable quantity of water, forms an emollient fluid, much used in therapeutics, but not the most easy of digestion. Two forms of gelatin are admitted—the one glutin or gelatin proper: the other chondrin.

GELÉE, Gelly—g. de ntre le Goître, Balsam, 'oduretted.

GELLY, Jelly, Jus gela'tum seu coagula'tum, Gelu, (F.) Gelée. Same etymon. A substance of a soft consistence, tremulous, and transparent, which is obtained, by an appropriate treatment, from animal and vegetable matters: hence the distinction into animal and vegetable jelly. The former is merely a concentrated solution of gelatin, left to cool.

Vegetable Jelly is found in the juice of the currant, mulberry, and of almost all acid fruits, when ripe. It is of itself colourless, but almost always retains a little colouring matter of the fruit which has furnished it. It has an agreeable taste; is scarcely soluble in cold water, but boiling water dissolves it readily: the jelly is, however, almost all deposited on cooling. If this aqueous solution be boiled for a long time, it becomes analogous to mucilage, and loses the property of being jellied on cooling.

GENERATION, Genera'tio, Gen'esis, Genne'sis, Gonē, Gonus, Procrea'tio, Procreation, Breeding, from (L.) geno, genere, genitum, γενω, or γενναω, 'to engender.' Under this name physiologists comprehend the aggregate of functions, which concur, in organized beings, towards the production of their kind. The act of generation means the union of the sexes. See Coition. The writers of antiquity believed, that all organized bodies are produced either by what is termed univ'ocal or regular generation, Homogen'esis, genera'tio homogen'ea, propagu'tio, which applies to the upper classes of animals and vegetables, or by spontaneous generation, Autogen'ia, heterogen'esis, generatio heterogen'ea seu æquiv'oca seu primiti'va seu primig''ena seu origina'ria seu sponta'nea, spontéparité (Dugès), which they considered applicable to the very lowest classes only, as the mushroom, the worm, the frog, &c. There are still many distinguished naturalists who consider that beings, low in the scale of animality, are produced in the latter way. Spontaneous generation and equivocal generation have been regarded by many to be synonymous. Others, however, mean by spontaneous generation, the production of a new being from the mere combination of inorganic elements; whilst by equivocal generation they understand the evolution of a new being from organized beings dissimilar to themselves, through some irregularity in their functions, or through the incipient decay or degeneration of their tissues. As to the mode in which regular generation is accomplished, there have been many views. According to the doctrine of Hippocrates, and of the ancient philosophers, the ovaries of the female furnish a prolific fluid, similar to that of the male; and the fœtus results from the mixture of the two seeds in copulation. Steno and others conceived, that the ovaries contain ova, which are not developed until vivified by the male sperm. Bonnet and Spallanzani believed in the pre-existence of germs, created since the origin of the world, but encased in each other, and becoming developed in succession; whence it would follow that the ovary of the first female must have contained the germs of all subsequent generations: and that the number of these germs must go on always diminishing, until ultimately extinct. This was the system of the evolution of germs. According to Leeuenboek, the ovaries do not contain eggs, but vesicles destined to receive animalcules; which, in his view, live in the sperm. Thousands of these animalcules are thrown into the uterus during copulation, and the most expeditious and vigorous reaches the ovary, after having scattered and destroyed its competitors. Buffon — admitting the hypothesis of the two seeds — supposed that they were formed of molecules proceeding from every part of the body of each parent; and that, by a kind of elective affinity, those which were furnished by the head, the trunk, or the extremities of the male parent, could only unite with those proceeding from the same parts of the female. Before him, Maupertuis, admitting, with many of the ancient philosophers, the system of Epigenesis, and adopting, as regarded the composition of the sperm, a theory analogous to that of Buffon, had supposed that the molecules, capable of being organized, were attracted towards a centre; that the nose attracts the two eyes; the body, the arms; the arms, the hands, &c., nearly as the particles of a salt, dissolved in a liquid, arrange themselves in regular crystals around the same nucleus. These and various other systems have been successively proposed and abandoned, and the mystery of generation remains impenetrable.

The simplest kind of reproduction does not require sexual organs. The animal separates into several fragments, which form so many new individuals. This is Fissip'arous generation, Fiss'iparism, G. from fission, (F.) Fissiparité, Scissiparité, Scission, Cloisonnement, Reproduction ou Multiplication mérismatique. Gemmip'arous generation, (F.) Gemmiparité, Génération par Gemmation, Surculation ou Bourgeonnement, consists in the formation of buds, sporules or germs on some part of the body, which at a particular period drop off and form as many new individuals. These kinds of reproduction require but one parent — Monog''eny. In Ovip'arous generation, (F.) Oviparité, the egg is hatched out of the body. In ovovivip'rous generation, the new being is hatched in the excretory passages. In vivip'arous generation, the new individual is born under its appropriate form; and in marsu'pial or marsu'piate generation, the young being, born at a very early stage of development, is received and nourished in a marsupium or pouch. In alternate generation, (F.) Génération alternante, the young not only do not resemble the parent at birth, but remain dissimilar during their whole life, so that their relationship is not apparent until a succeeding generation. Thus, the cercaria undergoes a change into the distoma. See Metagenesis. All these kinds of reproduction require the union of sexes—Dig''eny.

All the acts comprising the function of generation in man may be referred to five great heads. 1. Copulation. 2. Conception or fecundation. 3. Gestation or Pregnancy. 4. Delivery or Accouchement; and, 5. Lactation.

GLAND, Glan'dula, Gran'dula, (diminutive of glans, 'an acorn, a kernel.') Aden. The ancient anatomists gave this name to a number of organs of a texture generally soft, and a shape more or less globular, but differing greatly in their nature and functions. They applied it, for instance, 1. To those organs which separate from the blood, any fluid whatever. When such organs were composed of several lobules, united by common vessels, they received the name conglomerate glands, as the parotid, pancreas, &c. 2. To the reddish and spongy, knot-like bodies, which are met with in the course of the lymphatics. These they called conglobate glands;—see Ganglion, (lymphatic;) and 3dly and lastly, to various other organs, whose intimate texture and functions are still unknown, as the Pineal gland, Pituitary gland, Glands of Pacchioni, Thyroid gland, Thymus gland, Supra-renal glands, &c. Chaussier restricts the word gland to those softish, granular, lobated organs, composed of vessels, and a particular texture, of which there are in the human body, the lachrymal, salivary, and mammary, the testicles, the liver, pancreas, and kidneys. These permanent glands, or glands with permanent ducts, are all destined to draw from the blood the molecules necessary for the formation of new fluids, and to convey these fluids externally, by means of one or more excretory ducts. Several glands, besides their excretory ducts, have especial reservoirs, in which the fluids, secreted by them, collect, remain for a greater or less space of time, and undergo slight modifications before being evacuated;—such are, the gall-bladder for the liver, the urinary bladder for the kidneys, &c. Each gland has an organization peculiar to it, but we know not the intimate nature of the glandular texture.—Malpighi believed that the vessels terminate in small, solid masses, to which he gave the name—glandular grains or acini. In these, he considered, the excretory ducts originate. Ruysch thought that the glands are entirely vascular, and that the excretory ducts are immediately continuous with the vasa afferentia, &c. The best view, perhaps, is, that the exhaling or secreting vessel is distributed on the animal membrane, which forms the blind extremity of the excretory duct, and that the secretion is effected through it by means of cells.

The term glande (F.) is sometimes appropriated to the tumour formed by inflammation or engorgement of a lymphatic ganglion.

GLOB'ULIN, Glob'uline, Blood ca'sein. The colourless substance that remains after the abstraction of the colouring matter of the blood-corpuscle. It is a peculiar albuminous principle. The globulin of Berzelius consists of the envelopes of the blood globules, and of the part of their contents that remains after the extraction of the hæmatin. Lecanu regards it as identical with albumen; and, according to Mulder, it belongs to the combinations of protein. Robin and Verdeil consider it to be albuminose.

The term globulin is likewise given by M. Donné to small granulations appertaining to the chyle, which are observable in the blood with the microscope. They are small, white, roundish, isolated or irregularly-agglomerated grains; of about the 1-300 of a millimètre in diameter, and are regarded by M. Donné as the first elements of the blood globules. They are the white granulated corpuscles of Mandl.

An instrument, the invention of which is attributed to Paulus of Ægina, and which was employed to depress the tongue, in order to examine diseases of the fauces. It was composed of two branches; one of which had, at its extremity, a plate for depressing the tongue; whilst the other, shaped like a horse-shoe, was applied under the chin. The finger, or the handle of a spoon, or a spatula, is generally used in similar cases. See Catagoglossum.

It depends, generally, on an inflammatory swelling of the organ. At times, however, a chronic glossocele, or sort of œdematous engorgement, is met with; which proceeds to a great length, and deforms the dental arches, the lips, &c. Inflammatory glossocele must be combated by antiphlogistics. In the œdematous kind, such as is sometimes caused by excessive salivation, the infiltrated fluid may be pressed back by the hand of the practitioner, to get the tongue behind the teeth; and it may be kept there by a piece of gauze tied over the mouth. The chronic, elongated kind sometimes requires amputation of a portion of the organ.

GLOSSOCOMA, Glossospasmus.

GLOSSOC'OMON, Glossoc'omum, Glossocomi'on, from glosso, and κομεω, 'to guard.' The ancients gave this name to a small case for holding the tongues of their wind-instruments. Some anatomists have so denominated certain fleshy fibres, which pass from the base of the tongue towards the epiglottis. These muscles are more evident in some of the mammalia than in man; and their use seems to be,—to raise the epiglottis, and to remove it farther from the glottis. Santorini, who described them after Eustachius, calls them Retracto'res Epiglot'tidis.

They form part of the constrictor pharyngis superior.

This muscle is situate at the posterior part of the pelvis, and at the upper and posterior part of the thigh. It is large, thick, and quadrilateral; and is attached, above, to the posterior part of the crista ilii, to the part of the ilium comprised between the crista and the upper curved line, to the posterior surface of the sacrum, coccyx, and great sacro-sciatic ligament; and below, it terminates by a broad aponeurosis, which is inserted into the rugged surface that descends from the trochanter major to the linea aspera of the femur. This muscle extends the thigh on the pelvis, and rotates the thigh outwards. It is greatly concerned in station and progression.

GLUTÆ'US ME'DIUS, Glou'tius Secun'dus et Médius, (F.) Ilio-trochantérien: Grand Ilio-trochantérien, (Ch.,) Moyen Fessier. This muscle is situate in part beneath the preceding; it is broad, very thick, radiated, and triangular; attached, above, to the crista ilii, and to the part of the outer surface of that bone comprised between the three anterior fourths of its crista, its upper curved line, and its lower; and below, it ends by a tendon, inserted at the upper edge of the great trochanter. It is an abductor of the thigh; but can turn the thigh outwards or inwards, according as its posterior or inferior fibres are thrown separately into contraction.

GLUTÆ'US MIN'IMUS, G. minor, Ter'tius et In'timus Glou'tius, (F.) Petit Fessier; — Ilio-ischii-trochantérien, Petit Ilio-trochantérien (Ch.)

This muscle, which is situate beneath the preceding, is flat, triangular, and with radiated fibres. GLUTEAL ARTERY, Poste'rior Il'iac Artery, (F.) Artère fessière, is one of the largest branches of the hypogastric. It makes its exit from the pelvis at the upper part of the superior sciatic foramen; gains the posterior part of the pelvis, and divides into two branches; — the one superficial, the other deep-seated. GLUTEN, Glu'tinum, Lentor, 'glue, paste.' Veg"etable Gluten, Veg"etable Ca'sein. An immediate principle of vegetables. It is soft, of a grayish white, viscid consistence, and very elastic. Exposed to the air, it becomes hard, brown, and fragile; and, in moist air, putrefies. Water and alcohol do not dissolve it. It is soluble in vegetable, and in weak mineral, acids, at a high temperature. The farinæ, in which it is found, are those preferred for the preparation of bread; on account of the property it has of making the paste rise. It is a compound of protein, and hence has been ranged amongst the "proteinaceous alimentary principles" by Dr. Pereira. By washing wheaten dough with a stream of water, the gum, sugar, starch and vegetable albumen are removed: the ductile, tenacious, elastic, gray mass left is the gluten, common gluten, Beccaria's gluten. Pure gluten is the soluble portion on boiling common gluten in alcohol. Granulated gluten, Gluten granule, is a paste made by adding wheat gluten to ordinary wheat. It is said to form an agreeable and nutritious aliment.

GONORRHŒ'A. Erroneously called from γονη, 'sperm,' and ρεω, 'I flow,' because the older writers believed it to be a flux of semen. Blennorrhag''ia, Blennorrhœ'a, B. urethra'lis, Blennure'thria, Phallorrhœ'a, Medorrhœ'a, M. viri'lis, Catar'rhus gonorrhœ'a seu ure'thræ, Urethri'tis, Inflamma'tio ure'thræ, Urethral'gia, Profluvium muco'sum ure'thræ, Catarrhus urethra'lis, (F.) Écoulement, Uréthrite, Urétrite. An inflammatory discharge of mucus from the membrane of the urethra in both sexes; and from that of the prepuce in man, and the vagina in woman. It may be excited spontaneously, or by irritants applied directly to the membrane; but is usually produced by impure connexion. Two great varieties have been generally reckoned.—1. GONORRHŒA PURA SEU BENIG'NA. That which does not follow an impure connexion; (F.) Échauffement, Blennorrhag''ia benigna, Coulorrhœ'a benig'na, Catar'rhus Ure'thræ, Gonorrhœ'a catarrha'lis seu non contagio'sa: — and, 2. GONORRHŒA IMPU'RA, malig'na, contagio'sa, syphilit'ica, et virulen'ta; Fluor albus malig'nus, Fluxus vene'reus, Blennorrhœ'a luo'des, Baptorrhœ'a, Myxio'sis, Lues gonorrho'ica, Seroph'ulæ gonorrho'icæ, Tuber'cula gonorrho'ica, Clap. (Old E.) Chaudpys. (F.) Chaudepisse; that which is the result of impure commerce. The French, also, distinguish the Chaudepisse sèche, or that unaccompanied with discharge; and the Chaudepisse chordée, Gonnorrhœ'a corda'ta, or that accompanied with chordee, and which, of course, occurs only in the male. It is the kind that most frequently engages the attention of the practitioner, and is characterized by mucous discharge from the urethra or vagina, intermixed with specific matter, and accompanied with burning pain on micturition. It is decidedly infectious. It is, however, a distinct disease from syphilis, and never produces it. Its duration is various, but the inflammatory symptoms usually subside in four or five weeks; leaving generally behind more or less of the gonorrhœa mucosa or gleet. Gonorrhœa of every kind, attended with any inflammatory symptoms, is best treated by the antiphlogistic regimen; avoiding every kind of irritation, and keeping the body cool by small doses of salts, and the urine diluted by the mildest fluids. After the inflammatory symptoms have subsided, cubebs, or the balsam of copaiba, exhibited in the dose of a teaspoonful, three times a day, will be found effectual: indeed, during the existence of the inflammatory symptoms, it often affords decided relief. Injections are rarely required.

Sometimes, gonorrhœa affects the glans; when it is called Gonorrhœa Spu'ria seu Bal'ani, Balanoblennorrhœ'a, Balannorrhœ'a, Balani'tis, Blennorrhag''ia spu'ria seu notha, (F.) Blennorrhagie du gland, Gonorrhée bâtarde, Fausse Blennorrhagie. It requires only cleanliness and cooling lotions. This is the simple form of balanitis. It may, however, be of the impure kind—Balanorrhag''ia, (F.) Balanite contagieuse.

Some other varieties of gonorrhœa have been enumerated, but they are of little moment.

In consequence of repeated attacks of gonorrhœa, or of the debility induced by a single attack, it not unfrequently happens, as already remarked, that a constant, small discharge occurs, or remains behind, after all danger of infection is removed. The great difference between it and gonorrhœa is, that it is uninfectious. The discharge consists of globular particles, contained in a slimy mucus, and is generally devoid of that yellow colour which characterizes the discharge of gonorrhœa virulenta. It is unattended with pain, scalding, &c. To this state the names Gleet, Gonorrhœ'a muco'sa, Blennorrhœ'a chron''ica, Blennorrhœ'a, &c., have been given. It is commonly a disease of some duration, and demands the use of the copaiba, astringent injection; and, if obstinate, the introduction of the bougie.

GORGET, from (F.) gorge, 'the throat.' Cana'lis canalicula'tus, Ductor canalicula'tus, (F.) Gorgeret. An instrument representing a long gutter, in the shape of a throat, which is especially employed in the operations of lithotomy and fistula in ano.

GORGET, CUTTING, see Gorget, and Lithotomy.

GORGET, LITHOT'OMY, (F.) Gorgeret Lithotome, Cutting Gorget, is the one used in the operation for the stone, for the purpose of dividing the prostate and the neck of the bladder, so as to enable the surgeon to introduce the forceps and extract the stone. At the end of this gorget is a crest or beak, which fits the groove of the staff, and admits of the gorget being passed along it into the bladder. Besides cutting, there are also blunt gorgets, intended to be introduced into the wound—their concavity serving as a guide for the forceps into the bladder.

The chief modifications in the gorget have been made by Andouillet, Bell, Blicke, Bromfield, Cline, Desault, Foubert, Hawkins, Larrey, Lefèvre, Michaelis, Thomas, &c.

GORGET FOR FISTULA IN ANO consists of a semi-cylindrical wooden staff, four inches long, without including the handle, and furnished with a wide groove. This is introduced into the rectum, to prevent the point of the bistoury from injuring the intestine, when the internal orifice of the fistula is deeply situate, and it is desirable to perform the operation by incision. This instrument, invented by Marchettis, has been modified by Percy, Runge, &c.

Desault invented an instrument for conducting the wire by the anus, in the operation for fistula by ligature. He called it Gorgeret à repoussoir.

GOUT, Arthri'tis, Arth'ragra, Arthral'gia, Morbus domino'rum seu articula'ris, Malum articulo'rum, Gutta, Arthro'sia Pod'agra, Podal'gia, Pod'agra, Arthrit'icus vcrus, Arthri'tis Podagra, Podagra Arthri'tis, Fluxio arthrit'ica, Febris arthrit'ica seu Podag'rica, Arthrodyn'ia podag'rica, Cauma podag'ricum, Flerecin, Gastroarthri'tis, Misopto'chos, (Sc.) Gat, (F.) Goutte, Agrie.—Piorry. The gout was formerly regarded as a catarrh, and received its name from (F.) goutte, (L.) gutta, 'a drop;' because it was believed to be produced by a liquid, which distilled, goutte à goutte, 'drop by drop,' on the diseased part. This name, which seems to have been first used about the year 1270, has been admitted into the different languages of Europe. Gout is an inflammation of the fibrous and ligamentous parts of the joints. It almost always attacks, first, the great toe; whence it passes to the other smaller joints, after having produced, or been attended with, various sympathetic phenomena, particularly in the digestive organs: after this, it may attack the greater articulations. It is an affection which is extremely fugitive, and variable in its recurrence. It may be acquired or hereditary. In the former case, it rarely appears before the age of thirty-five; in the latter, it is frequently observed earlier. It is often difficult to distinguish it from rheumatism. A combination is, indeed, supposed to exist sometimes; hence called Rheumatic gout. During the paroxysm or fit, a burning, lancinating pain is experienced in the affected joint, attended with tumefaction, tension, and redness. One or more joints may be attacked, either at the same time or in succession; and, in either case, the attack terminates by resolution in a few days. This is the Arthri'tis acu'ta seu inflammato'ria seu regula'ris, Regular gout, Arthro'sia pod'agra regula'ris, Arth'ragra legit'ima seu vera seu genui'na seu norma'lis, (F.) Goutte régulière chaude. At other times, pains in the joints exist, of more or less acute character; the swelling being without redness. These pains persist, augment, and diminish irregularly, without exhibiting intermission, and, consequently, without having distinct paroxysms. The disease is then called aton'ic, asthen'ic, imperfect or irregular gout, Chronic G., Arthri'tis aton'ica seu asthen'ica, Arthro'sia Podagra larva'ta, Dysarthri'tis. It is, also, commonly called in France Goutte froide, Goutte blanche. It may appear primarily, or succeed attacks of regular gout.

Gout does not always confine itself to the joints. It may attack the internal organs: when it is called Arthritis aber'rans seu errat'ica seu planet'ica, Arth'ragra anom'ala, Pod'agra aber'rans, Vare'ni, Wandering, misplaced, or anomalous gout, (F.) Goutte vague.

Ret'rograde gout, Arthritis retrog'rada, Podagra retrog'rada, Arthro'sia Podagra complica'ta, Recc'dent or miepla'ced gout, (F.) Goutte remontée, G. malplacée, G. rentrée, is when it leaves the joints suddenly and attacks some internal organ, as the stomach, intestines, lungs, brain, &c.

Gout is also called, according to the part it may affect, Podagra, Gonagra, Chiragra, &c. It may be acute or chronic, and may give rise to concretions, which are chiefly composed of urate of soda. See Calculus, (arthritic.) It may, also, give occasion to nodosities, when it is called Arthritis nodo'sa, (F.) Goutte noüée.

The treatment is of the antiphlogistic kind, and the local disorder should be but little interfered with. Colchicum seems to have great power over the disease. It forms the basis of the Eau médicinale d'Husson, a celebrated French gout-remedy. The bowels must be kept regular by rhubarb and magnesia; and a recurrence of the disease be prevented by abstemious habits.

GOUT, DIAPHRAGMATIC, Angina pectoris.

They are the product of inflammatory excitement, and may be produced in indolent ulcers, by exciting the parts by proper stimulants. They form the basis of the cicatrix.

Granulation is, likewise, a name given by the modern French physicians to an organic lesion, consisting in the formation of small, round, firm, shining, semi-transparent tumours, of the size and shape of millet-seed, or of a pea; which are met with in the lungs particularly, and in considerable quantity; often without materially interfering with their functions.

In pharmacy, granulation is a process by which a metal is reduced to fine grains, by melting it, and causing it, whilst liquid, to pass through a kind of sieve into a vessel of water,—as in the making of shot:—or by shaking or rubbing the melted metal in an appropriate box or vessel,—as in the formation of granular tin or granulated zinc.

They who speak thick, like the inhabitants of Newcastle, in England, or of Havre, in France, have difficulty in pronouncing the r, and they frequently substitute for it the letter l; but this does not properly constitute Grasseyement. It consists in this: that, in words in which the letter r is joined to another consonant, a sort of burring or guttural rolling is heard, nearly like that produced by gargling. See Rotocism.

These concretions, which are commonly composed of uric acid and an animal matter, are deposited at the bottom of the vessel, immediately after the excretion of the urine; and, by their hardness and resistance under the finger, differ considerably from the ordinary sediment of that liquid. A vegetable diet and alkaline drinks are the best prophylactics. See Calculi, urinary. A fit of the Gravel, Nephral'gia calculo'sa seu arenо'sa, Colica nephrit'ica, is the excruciating suffering induced by the passage of gravel from the kidney to the bladder. GRAV'ITY, SPECIF'IC, Gravitas specif'ica, (F.) Pesanteur spécifique. The relation between the weight of a body and its bulk: thus, supposing four bodies to be of the same size, but to weigh, one four, another three, another two, and the fourth one; the specific gravity of the first will be four times greater than that of the last. The specific gravities of different bodies are, therefore, as the weights, bulk for bulk. For solids, and liquids, water is taken as the unit; atmospheric air for the gases. Thus, water is 1.000; mercury, at the common temperature, 13.58. Whence, we conclude mercury is between thirteen and fourteen times heavier than water.

Blood is then passed by vomiting, and sometimes, also, by stool,—the blood being generally of a grumous aspect. Hæmatemesis may be active or passive, acute or chronic. The blood effused proceeds from rupture of vessel, or from a sanguineous exhalation at the surface of the mucous membrane of the stomach. It is often observed in females whose menstrual secretion is irregularly performed. It is not of much danger, except when connected with disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen. On dissection of those who have died from protracted hæmatemesis,—for the acute kind is comparatively devoid of danger,—the mucous membrane of the stomach is found red and inflamed, or black, and the vessels considerably dilated. Complete abstinence from food; rest; the horizontal posture; bleeding, if the hemorrhage be active; cold, acidulous drinks, &c., constitute the usual treatment.

The red colouring matter of the blood. It resides in distinct particles or globules, and, in the opinion of some observers, in the envelope of the globules. It appears to be of a peculiar character, and one that has not yet been determined by the chemist. Others, again, have applied it to effusions of blood into the interior of the tunica albuginea itself. — Richter. The first is the usual acceptation. An extremely alarming carcinomatous affection, which was first described, with accuracy, by Mr. John Burns, of Glasgow. It consists in the development of cancerous tumours, in which the inflammation is accompanied with violent heat and pain, and with fungus and bleeding excrescences. Even when the diseased part is extirpated at a very early period, recovery rarely follows; other organs being generally implicated at the same time. Fungus hæmatodes was the term first applied to the disease by Mr. Hey of Leeds. Mr. J. Burns called it Spongoid inflammation, from the spongy, elastic feel, which peculiarly characterizes it, and continues even after ulceration has taken place. The discase has, most frequently, been met with in the eyeball, the upper and lower extremities, testicle and mamma; but it occurs in the uterus, ovary, liver, spleen, brain, lungs, thyroid gland, and in the hip and shoulder-joint.

Some French surgeons designate, by this name, those tumours which were formerly termed anormales, caverneuses, variqueuses, called Erectiles by Dupuytren, Hématoncies, by Alibert, and Telangiectasiæ by Gräfe.

The column of blood, which comes from the heart, pushes the column of water before it, and thus enables the velocity of the blood to be estimated.

Hemorrhage from the mucous membrane of the lungs; characterized by the expectoration of more or less florid and frothy blood. It is generally preceded by cough; dyspnœa; sense of heat in the chest, &c. It is important to discriminate between hæmoptysis, produced by some accidental cause acting irregularly or periodically on the lungs; and that which is, as it were, constitutional, and dependent on some organic affection of the lungs, or some faulty conformation of the chest. These two varieties differ as much in their prognosis and method of treatment as in their causes. Constitutional hæmoptysis is a serious disease, almost always announcing phthisis pulmonalis. The accidental variety is chiefly dangerous by frequent recurrence, or too great loss of blood.

The general causes of hæmoptysis are the same as those of other kinds of hemorrhage. It has, besides, particular causes; such as too great exercise of the lungs; loud speaking; playing on wind instruments, breathing acrid vapours, &c. It usually occurs between puberty and the age of 35. A sudden and terrific kind of hæmoptysis is sometimes met with; consisting in a great afflux of blood to the lungs. This has been called Pul'monary Ap'oplexy, Apoplex'ia pulmona'lis seu pulmo'num, Pneumorrhag''ia, Infarc'tus hæmorrhag''icus pulmo'num, I. hæmopto'icus Laënnec'tii, (F.) Apoplexie pulmonaire, Hémoptysie foudroyante, Hémorrhagie interstitielle du Poumon. Infiltration of blood into the air-cells may occur without any hæmoptysis.

Physical signs. Percussion may not always aid us in hæmoptysis, but generally a circumscribed dulness will be perceived. The inspiratory murmur, on auscultation, is feeble or absent, locally; and is replaced by bronchial respiration and bronchophony. A fine liquid crepitus is detected around the affected part; and in the larger tubes, near the spine, a liquid bubbling rhonchus is usually heard. The value of these signs is determined by the nature of the expectoration. The treatment of hæmoptysis must be like that of internal hemorrhage in general.

HÆMORRHAG''IA, from hæma, and ρηγνυμι, 'I break forth.' San'guinis profu'vium copio'sum, Sanguiflux'us, Hæmatoch'ysis, Aimorrhœ'a, Hæmorrhœ'a, Hæmatorrhag''ia, Hæmatis'mus, Hæmatorrhœ'a, Hæmator'rhysis, Hæmorr'hysis, Profu'vium seu Prorup'tio seu Eruptio sanguinis, Profu'sio Sang'uinis, Hem'orrhage, Hæmorrhage, Bleeding, Loss of blood, Rupturing, bursting, or breaking of a blood-vessel, (Prov.) Floating, (F.) Hémorrhagie ou Hémorhagie, Perte de sang, Flux de sang. Any discharge of blood from vessels destined to contain it; with or without rupture of their coats. Hemorrhages may be spontaneous or traumatic: the first belong to the domain of medicine, the latter to that of surgery. They may, also, be internal or external; general — as in scurvy — or local. The hemorrhages by exhalation — those which chiefly interest the physician — have been classed, by Pinel, as follows: — 1. Hemorrhage of the Mucous Membranes; Epistaxis, Hæmoptysis, Hæmatemesis, Hæmorrhoids, Hæmaturia, Uterine Hemorrhage. 2. Hemorrhage of the Tissues; Cutaneous, Cellular, Serous, Synovial.

Hemorrhages have generally been distinguished into active and passive: in other words into those dependent upon augmentation of the organic actions, and those dependent upon debility. According to Broussais, no spontaneous hemorrhage is passive; all are active, — that is, produced by increased action and excess of irritation of the blood-vessels: they may occur with debility, but not from debility. He calls those only passive hemorrhages, which are owing to an external lesion of the vessels. Hemorrhages have been, by some, divided into constitutional, or those depending on original conformation: — accidental, or those produced by some adventitious cause; supplementary, or those which succeed others; symptomatic, critical, &c. A secondary hemorrhage is one that occurs some time after wounds or operations.

When hemorrhage takes place into any tissue, or is interstitial, it receives the name, with many, of apoplexy.

Active Hemorrhage, Hemorrhag''ia acti'va seu arterio'sa, Cauma hæmorrhag'icum, Angeiorrhag''ia, occurs chiefly in the young and plethoric. Good living; the use of fermented liquor — excessive exercise, or too sedentary a life, may perhaps be ranked as predisponent causes. It is commonly preceded by heaviness and pulsation in the part, — owing to the afflux of blood and consequent hyperæmia, — and by coldness of the extremities. The blood, evacuated, is generally of a florid red. In such active hemorrhages, the great indications of treatment will be, to diminish plethora where it exists, and to lessen the heart's action. Bleeding, purgatives, and cold, will be the chief agents.

Passive Hemorrhage, Hæmorrhag''ia passi''va seu veno'sa, Profu'sio, P. hæmorrhag''ica, occurs in those of weak constitution; or who have been debilitated by protracted disease, poor diet, long watching, excessive evacuations, &c.

The direct causes may be: — previous active hemorrhage; scorbutus, or any thing capable of inducing atony or asthenic hyperæmia of the small vessels. These hemorrhages are not preceded by excitement or by any signs of local determination. They are usually accompanied by paleness of the countenance; feeble pulse; fainting, &c. The indications of treatment will be:— to restore the action of the small vessels and the general tone of the system: hence the utility of styptics and cold externally; and of tonics and astringents, creasote, mineral acids, &c., internally. Hemorrhage also occurs from mechanical hyperæmia, as when hæmoptysis is produced by tubercles in the lungs: hæmatemesis by disease of some of the solid viscera of the abdomen, &c.

In Traumatic Hemorrhages, or those which are the consequences of wounds of arterial or venous trunks, the blood is of a florid red colour, and issues by jets and pulses, if it proceed from an artery; whilst it is of a deeper red, issues slowly and by a continuous flow, if from a vein. If the capillary vessels be alone divided, the blood is merely effused at the surface of the wound. Of the means used for arresting these traumatic hemorrhages, some act mechanically as absorbents, ligature, and compression; others chymically, as fire, caustics, creasote, astringents, &c.

HÆMORRHOIDAL ARTERIES have been distinguished into superior, middle, and inferior. 1. The first is the termination of the inferior mesenteric artery, which assumes the name superior hemorrhoidal, when it reaches the upper and posterior part of the rectum. 2. The middle hemorrhoidal is furnished by the hypogastric or internal pudic. It ramifies on the inferior and anterior part of the rectum. 3. The inferior hemorrhoidal arteries are branches of the internal pudic, furnished to the inferior part of the rectum and to the muscles of the anus.

HÆMORRHOIDAL NERVES. These emanate from the sciatic and hypogastric plexuses; and cover the rectum with their numerous filaments.

HÆMORRHOIDAL VEINS follow the same distribution, and generally empty themselves into the lesser mesenteric. Some of them assist in the formation of the hypogastric vein.

HÆMORRHOIDAL VESSELS, Vasa sceda'lia, are those vessels which are distributed to the rectum —the seat of hemorrhoids.

HÆMOR'RHOIS, Aimor'rhoïs. Asclepias'mus, from hæma, and ῥεω, 'I flow.' Aimor'roïs, Proc'tica Maris'ca, Maris'ca, Proctol'gia Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Morbus Hæmorrhoidalis, Piles, Em'erods, (F.) Hémorrhoïdes. The essential symptoms of this affection are: — Livid and painful tubercles or excrescences, (Hemorrhoid'al Tumours,) usually attended with a discharge of mucus or blood, (Hemorrhoid'al flux, Proctorrhœ'a, Hæmoproc'tia, Hæmorrhœ'a vasorum hæmorrhoïda'lium, (F.) Hémaproctie.) The most common causes of piles are a sedentary life; accumulation of fæces in the rectum; violent efforts at stool; pregnancy, &c. The precursory symptoms are: — pains in the loins; stupor of the lower limbs; and uneasiness in the abdomen and rectum, with more or less gastric, cerebral, and indeed general disorder; — constituting the Diath'esis Hæmorrhoïda'lis, Motus seu Turba Hæmorrhoïda'lis, and Moli'men Hæmorrhoïda'lē, of most of the writers of Continental Europe. To these symptoms follow one or more round, smooth, renitent, painful, pulsating, and erectile tumours, around the margin of the anus, or within the anus; some pouring out blood occasionally. After having remained, for a time, tense and painful, they gradually shrink and disappear. The chief symptoms, occasioned by hemorrhoidal tumours, when much inflamed, are;—constant pain, liable, however, to exacerbations, and to become augmented by the least pressure, or by the passage of the fæces, and obliging the patient to preserve the horizontal posture.

Hæmorrhoids have generally been distinguished into — Hæmorrhoïdes Fluen'tes seu Mariscoʻsæ, Proc'tica Maris'ca cruen'ta, Bleeding or Open Piles; and into H. non fluen'tes, Proc'tica Maris'ca cæca, Hæmorrhoï'des cæcæ seu furen'tes, Hæmorrhoida'les nodi, Shut or blind piles. They have, also, been divided into internal or occult, and external, according to their situation; and into accidental or constitutional.

Hemorrhoidal Tumours are extremely troublesome, by their disposition to frequent recurrence; and they are apt to induce fistula; otherwise, they are devoid of danger. When anatomically examined, they are found not to consist in a varicose dilatation of the veins of the rectum; but to be formed of a very close, spongy, texture; similar to that which surrounds the orifice of the vagina; and to be erectile, like it. They are surrounded by a delicate membrane, and have no internal cavity. The treatment, in mild cases of hemorrhoidal tumours, is simple. Rest; the horizontal posture; the use of mild laxatives, as sulphur, castor oil, and emollient glysters, will be sufficient. If they be much inflamed, leeches may be applied; and warm cataplasms or cold lotions, according to circumstances, be prescribed, with abstinence, and cooling drinks. Afterwards, an ointment, composed of powdered galls and opium, may afford relief. It is in the relaxed kind, that such ointment, and the internal use of Ward's Paste, can alone be expected to afford much benefit. If, after repeated attacks, the tumours remain hard and painful, and threaten fistula, they may be removed.

By Hemorrhoidal Flux, Fluxus hæmorrhoïda'lis, Proctorrhag''ia, is meant the hemorrhage which takes place from the rectum, owing to hemorrhoids. It is a common affection. The quantity of blood discharged is various: at times, it is very trifling; at others, sufficient to induce great debility, and even death. It is announced and accompanied by the same symptoms as precede and attend hemorrhoidal tumonrs. Like other hemorrhages it may be active or passive; accidental or constitutional. The prognosis is rarely unfavourable. The affection may, almost always, be relieved by properly adapted means. These resemble such as are necessary in hemorrhages in general. Perfect quietude, — mental and corporeal; light diet; cooling drinks; bleeding if the symptoms indicate it; astringents, (if the disease be protracted and passive,) such as the Tinctura Ferri Chloridi; aspersions of cold water on the anus: astringent injections; plugging and compression. Such will be the principal remedial agents. When the hemorrhage has become habitual, or is vicarious, some caution may be required in checking it; and, if inconvenience arise from a sudden suppression, its return may be solicited by the semicupium, sitting over warm water, aloetic purgatives, glysters, irritating suppositories, &c.; or leeches may be applied to the anus.

To the internal bleeding pile, a soft, red, strawberry-like elevation of the mucous membrane, Dr. Houston, of Dublin, gives the name vascular tumour. For its removal he recommends the application of nitric acid, so as to produce sloughing of its surface.

Some authors have described a species of Leucorrhœ'a Ana'lis or whitish discharge from the anus, which often attends ordinary hæmorrhoids. This they have called Proctica maris'ca muco'sa, Hæmor'rhoïs alba, Hæmorrhag''ia muco'sa, Leucor'rhoïs, &c. It requires no special mention.

The term Hemorrhoid is applied at times to varicose veins developed elsewhere, as at the orifice of the uterus. See Metræmorrhoïdes.

It is composed as follows: — Eight ounces of tincture of benzoin, one pound of alum, and ten pounds of water are boiled together for six hours in a glazed earthen vessel, the vaporized water being constantly replaced by hot water, so as not to interrupt the ebullition, and the resinous mass being kept stirred round. It has been so called, in consequence of the upper lip of the hare being thus divided. Hare-lip is generally congenital; at other times it is accidental, or produced by a wound, the edges of which have not been brought into contact, and have healed separately. It is simple, when there is but one division; double, when there are two; and complicated, when there is, at the same time, a division or cleft of the superior maxillary bone and of the palate — Cleft or fissured palate, Wolf's jaw, Pala'tum fissum, Rictus lupi'nus; or a projection of the teeth into the separation of the lip.

In the Hare-lip operation, there are two indications to be fulfilled. First, to pare, with the knife or scissors, the edges of the cleft, and, afterwards, to preserve them in contact; in order to cause adhesion. This last object is accomplished by means of pins, passed through the edges of the division; in other words, by the twisted suture. The projecting teeth must, of course, be previously removed. If there be separation of the palate, it will become less and less after the union of the lip, or the operation of staphyloraphy may be performed upon it.

An instance of harmony occurs in the union of the superior maxillary bones with each other.

HEART, Sax. heopt, Germ. Herz, Cor, Cear, Cer, Car'dia, κεαρ, κηρ, καρδια, (F.) Cœur. An azygous muscle, of an irregularly pyramidal shape; situate obliquely and a little to the left side, in the chest;—resting on the diaphragm by one of its surfaces:—suspended by its base from the great vessels; free and movable in the rest of its extent, and surrounded by the pericardium. The right side of the body of the heart is thin and sharp, and is called Margo acu'tus: the left is thick and round, and termed Margo obtu'sus. It is hollow within, and contains four cavities: two of which, with thinner and less fleshy walls, receive the blood from the lungs and the rest of the body, and pour it into two others, with thick and very fleshy parietes, which send it to the lungs and to every part of the body. Of these cavities, the former are called auricles, the latter ventricles. The right auricle and right ventricle form the Pulmonic or right or anterior heart, Cor veno'sum seu pulmona'lē, (F.) Cœur du poumon, C. du sang noir, C. droit, C. antérieur: and the left auricle and ventricle, the systemic, corporeal, left, or aortic heart, Cor arterio'sum seu aor'ticum, (F.) Cœur du corps, C. gauche, C. aortique ou C. rouge. In the adult, these are totally distinct from each other, being separated by a partition;—the septum cordis. Into the right auricle, the venæ cavæ,—superior and inferior,—and the coronary vein, open. The pulmonary artery arises from the right ventricle; the four pulmo-

The mean weight of the heart, in the adult, from the twenty-fifth to the sixtieth year, is, according to Bouillaud, from eight to nine ounces. The dimensions, according to Lobstein and Bouillaud, are as follows: — Length, from base to apex, five inches six lines; breadth, at the base, three inches; thickness of the walls of the left ventricle, seven lines; at a finger's breadth above the apex, four lines; thickness of the walls of the right ventricle, two and a quarter lines; at the apex, half a line; thickness of right auricle, one line; of the left auricle, half a line. The heart is covered, externally, by a very thin, membranous reflection from the pericardium. The muscular structure of which it is constituted is much thicker in the parietes of the ventricle than in those of the auricles. Its cavities are lined by a very delicate membrane, the endocardium, which is continuous with the inner membrane of the arteries, as regards the left cavities, and with that of the veins, as regards the right. Its arteries— the coronary — arise from the commencement of the aorta. Its nerves proceed, chiefly, from the pneumogastric and the cervical ganglions of the great sympathetic. The heart is the great agent in the circulation. By its contraction, the blood is sent over every part of the body. Its action does not seem to be directly owing to nervous influence received from the brain or spinal marrow, or from both. The circulation may, indeed, be kept up, for some time, if both brain and spinal marrow be destroyed.

When the ear is applied to the chest, a dull, lengthened sound is heard, which is synchronous with the arterial pulse. This is instantly succeeded by a sharp, quick sound, like that of the valve of a bellows or the lapping of a dog, and this is followed by a period of repose. The first sound appears to be mainly produced by the contraction of the ventricles; the second, by the reflux of the blood against the semilunar valves. These are what are called the Sounds of the Heart, (F.) Bruits du Cœur. Dr. C. J. B. Williams thinks that the word lubb-dup conveys a notion of the two sounds. The Beating or Impulse of the heart, Heart-stroke, Pulsus seu Ictus cordis, (F.) Impulsion du Cœur, against the parietes of the chest, is mainly caused, perhaps, by the systole of the heart, which tends to project it forwards. It is doubted, however, by some, whether the impulsion be produced by the dilatation or the contraction of the ventricles.

The following table exhibits the different actions of the heart, and their coincidence with its sounds and impulse. It presumes, that the period from the commencement of one pulsation to that of another is divided into eight parts; and if the ease of a person, whose pulse beats sixty times in a minute, be taken, each of these parts will represent the eighth of a second.

EIGHTHS OF A SECOND.

Last part of the pause....	1...	Auricles contracting; ventricles distended.
First sound and impulse..	4...	Ventricles contracting; auricles dilating.
Second sound.....	2...	Ventricles dilating; auricles dilating.
Pause...	1...	Ventricles dilating; auricles distended.

The heart is subject to different organic diseases; the chief of which are aneurism, contraction of the apertures, and rupture of its parietes.

HEART, AT'ROPHY OF THE, Atroph'ia seu Ardu'ra seu Phthisis Cordis, Cardiatroph'ia, Acardiotroph'ia. A condition of the organ in which there is diminution in the thickness of the parietes of the whole organ.

HEART, HY'PERTROPHY OF THE, Hypertroph'ia Cordis, Hypercor'dia, Hypersarco'sis Cordis, Hypercardiotroph'ia, Cardiaux'ē, Aneurys'ma cordis acti'vum (Corvisart), Cor bovi'num seu taurī'num, Enor'mitas cordis, (F.) Hypertrophie du Cœur. Supernutrition of the muscular parietes of the heart, which are thicker than usual; the cavities being generally diminished. The physical signs which indicate it are the following. In cases of long standing, the præcordial region is generally prominent; the pulsations of the heart are visible over a greater extent than natural: and a marked vibration is communicated to the hand when placed on the cardiac region. The dull sound on percussion is more extensive than natural; and on auscultation there is a permanent increase of the force and extent of the heart's action; there is no increase, however, of frequency, and the rhythm is regular. The pulse is generally strong, full, and hard.

HEART, HYPERTROPHY WITH DILATATION OF THE, Active an'eurism, Eccen'tric hy'pertrophy. In this affection, the pulsations can be seen and felt over a larger space, and the apex is more to the left and lower down than natural. The impulse is less steady, but at times more violent than that which accompanies simple hypertrophy. Percussion gives more distinct evidence of the enlargement, the sound being more extensively dull. On auscultation, the impulse is often violent, but irregular: in extreme cases, it produces the sensation of a large mass of flesh rolling or revolving beneath the ear. The pulse is strong, full, and vibratory. The shock of the heart's action is often transmitted to the whole person, and to the bed on which the patient is lying.

HEART, CONCENTRIC HYPERTROPHY OF THE, (F.) Hypertrophie concentrique, Hypertrophie centripète du Cœur, Retrait ventriculaire, Cardiarctie, is when the parietes augment at the expense of the cavities.

HEAT, past participle of Sax. hætan, 'to make warm.' Calor, Therma, Θερμη. (F.) Chaleur. The material cause, which produces the sensation—or the particular sensation itself—produced by a body of an elevated temperature, on our organs, especially on the organs of touch. Modern chymists have given the name Calor'ic to the principle, whatever may be its nature, which is the cause of heat. When we touch a body of a temperature superior to our own, a portion of caloric passes from the body to the hand, and produces the sensation of heat. If, on the contrary, we touch a body of a temperature inferior to our own, we communicate a portion of our caloric to it, and experience the sensation of cold. Our own sensations are but imperfect indexes of temperature. Two men meeting at the middle of a mountain,—the one ascending, the other descending, — will experience different sensations. The one ascending, passes from a warmer to a colder atmosphere; — the one descending from a colder to a warmer.

The chief instrument for measuring heat, used in medicine, is the thermometer. Of this there are three kinds: — that of Fahrenheit, that of Réaumur, and that of Celsius or the Centigrade. The following Table exhibits the correspondence of these different thermometric scales.

Thermometers.

The human body can bear a high degree of heat diffused in the atmosphere. There are cases on record, where air of 400° and upwards, of Fahrenheit's scale, has been breathed with impunity for a short time. It can likewise withstand very severe cold. In the expedition of Capt. Back to the Arctic regions, the thermometer was as low as — 70° of Fahr., and Sir George Simpson affirms, that it has fallen in Siberia to — 83°, or 115° below the freezing point. Dr. Kane, in the Arctic regions, in 1853–54, observed the range of eleven spirit thermometers, selected as standards, to vary from — 60° to — 75°. The mean annual temperature was 5°.2 — the lowest ever registered.

Excessive heat disposes the body to gastric and intestinal diseases, and particularly to inflammation and enlargement of the liver; hence, the frequency of such affections within the torrid zone. Heat is often used therapeutically: the actual cautery, at a white heat, disorganizes the parts to which it is applied: a lesser degree occasions violent inflammation. Heat higher than that of the human body is excitant; of a lower degree, sedative. Excessive cold acts as a powerful sedative — inducing sleep, the tendency to which, after long exposure, becomes irresistible. See Cold. Many of the topical applications — as cataplasms—act wholly by virtue of their warmth and moisture.

Heat, Ardor vene'reus, Pruri'tus, (F.) Chaleurs, Chaleurs des Animaux, Rut, is the periodical sexual desire experienced by animals.—Œstrua'tion. It is supposed by some to be owing to the periodical maturation and discharge of ova,—Ovula'tion.

Heat, Inter'nal, (F.) Chaleur interne, is a sensation of heat felt by the patient, but not sensible to the touch. External heat, (F.) Chaleur extérieure, that which can be felt by others. Heat, Ardor, is called moist, (F.) haliteuse, when accompanied with moisture, like that felt after bathing; dry, (F.) sèche, when the skin has not its ordinary softness. It is called acrid and pungent, (F.) âcre et mordicante, when it conveys a disagreeable tingling to the fingers. The French employ the terms nervous heat and errat'ic heat, Chaleur nerveuse and Chaleur erratique, for that which comes by flushes, alternating with chills, and which moves rapidly from one part to another. M. Double has used the term septic heat, (F.) Chaleur septique, for that which produces a pungent sensation on the hand, similar to that of the acrid heat, but milder and more uniform, and which is accompanied with feebleness and frequency of pulse, &c.

Of the other departments of medicine we cannot judge of their knowledge.

The name of a slow, continued, or remittent fever, which generally accompanies the end of organic affections, and has been esteemed idiopathic, although it is probably always symptomatic. It is the fever of irritation and debility; and is characterized by progressive emaciation, frequent pulse, hot skin, — especially of the palms of the hands and soles of the feet,— and, towards the end, colliquative sweats and diarrhœa. Being symptomatic, it can only be removed by getting rid of the original affection. This is generally difficult, and almost hopeless in the disease which it most commonly accompanies,—consumption.

HELICINE ARTERIES of the penis, as described by J. Müller, are short vessels given off from the larger branches, as well as from the finest twigs of the artery of the organ: most of those come off at a right angle, and project into the cavity of the spongy substance, either terminating abruptly or swelling out into a club-like process without again subdividing. Almost all these vessels are bent like a horn, so that the end describes half a circle or somewhat more. They have a great resemblance to the tendrils of the vine, whence their name. A minute examination of them, either with the lens or the microscope, shows that, although they at all times project into the venous cavities of the corpora cavernosa, they are not entirely naked, but are covered with a delicate membrane, which, under the microscope, appears granular.

Jecin'oris, Febris hepat'ica inflammato'ria, Hepatal'gia phlegmonoï'des, Morbus jecin'oris, Hepatophleg'monê, Inflammation of the liver,* (F.) Hépatite, inflammation du foie, Pièce, (Provincial); from ἡπαρ, ἡπατος, 'liver,' and itis denoting inflammation. It may be seated either in the peritoneal covering, Sero-hepati'tis, Hepati'tis velamento'sa seu extern'a, Peritoni'tis hepat'ica, Perihepati'tis, or in the substance of the liver, Hepati'tis parenchymato'sa, or in both, Puro-hepati'tis, and may be acute or chronic. The peculiar symptoms are:—pain in the right hypochondrium, shooting to the back and right shoulder, an increased on pressure; difficulty of lying on the left side; sometimes jaundice with cough, and synocha. Its termination is generally by resolution: — in tropical climates it often runs on to suppuration, Jec'oris vom'ica, Hepati'tis apostemato'sa, the abscess breaking either externally, or forming a communication with the intestines or chest, or breaking into the cavity of the abdomen. The causes are those of inflammation in general. Heat predisposes to it; hence its greater frequency in hot climates. On dissection of those who have died of it, the liver has been found hard and enlarged; colour of a deep purple; or the membranes have been more or less vascular; or adhesions, or tubercles, or hydatids, or abscesses, or biliary calculi may be met with. The treatment must be bold. Bleeding, general and local, fomentations, blisters, purgatives, and the antiphlogistic regimen. In hot climates especially, a new action must be excited by mercury as early as possible.

HEPATITIS, CHRONIC, Hepati'tis chron'ica, Inflamma'tio he'patis lenta, Hepatitis occul'ta, Hepatic'ula, Subinflamma'tio he'patis, (F.) Chronohépatite, Chronic liver disease, is not as common as is believed. It may be suspected from the existence of the symptoms above mentioned, when in a minor degree; enlargement, constant dull pain in the region of the liver; sallow countenance; high-coloured urine; clay-coloured fæces, &c. The great object of treatment is to excite a new action by mercury and counter-irritants, and to keep the liver free by cathartics.

An epithet given to diseases, communicated from progenitors. Such diseases may exist at birth; or they may supervene at a more or less advanced period of existence. Hereditary diseases, Morbi hereditа'rii, (F.) Maladies héréditaires, often prevail amongst several members of a family, or are family diseases or complaints.

HERMAPHRODISIA, Hermaphrodcity.

HERMAPH'RODITE. Same etymon. Hermaphrodi'tus, Gy'nida, Androg''ynus, (Sc.) Scarcht, (Prov.) Scrat. One who possesses the attributes of male and female: who unites in himself the two sexes. A term, applied to an animal or plant which is, at the same time, both male and female. True hermaphrodites are only met with in the lower degrees of the animal scale, amongst the zoophytes, mollusca, or gasteropoda. The individuals of the human species, regarded as hermaphrodites, owe this appearance to a vicious conformation of the genital organs; a kind of monstrosity, which renders them unfit for generation, although an attentive examination may exhibit the true sex. Hermaphrodites have, likewise, been described, which, instead of uniting the attributes of both sexes, cannot be considered male or female. These have been called neutral hermaphrodites.

HERMAPHRODITISMUS, Hermaphrodeity.

By some, it is supposed to be identical with the Iris tubero'sa. The best testimony seems to be in favour of its being a variety of the colchicum, — Col'chicum Illyr'icum. Under the name Hermodactyls, roots or bulbs of an unknown plant, growing in the countries about the eastern extremity of the Mediterranean, are sold in the shops of Europe.

HERMODATE, Hermodactylus.

HERMOPH'ILUS, from 'Ερμης, 'Mercury,' and φιλος, 'a lover.' One who is fond of mercury as a medicine.

HER'NIA, Ramex, Ruptu'ra, R. hernio'sa, Crepatu'ra, Ectop'ia hernio'sa, Celē, Rupture, Burst, (F.) Hargne, Descente, Effort, Greveure, Rompeure. From ερνος, 'a shoot' [?]. Any tumour, formed by the displacement of a viscus or a portion of a viscus, which has escaped from its natural cavity by some aperture, and projects externally. Herniæ have been divided into,—1. Hernia of the Brain; Encephalocele; 2. Hernia of the Thorax; Pneumocele; 3. Hernia of the Abdomen.

Abdom'inal Herniæ are remarkable for their frequency, variety, and the danger attending them. They are produced by the protrusion of the viscera, contained in the abdomen, through the natural or accidental apertures in the parietes of that cavity. The organs, which form them most frequently, are the intestines and the epiploon. These herniæ have been divided, according to the apertures by which they escape, into:

1. In'guinal or Supra-Pu'bian Herniæ. These issue by the inguinal canal: they are called Bubonoce'lē, when small; and Scrotal Hernia or Oscheoce'lē, in man, when they descend into the scrotum: — Vulvar Hernia or Puden'dal or La'bial Hernia, Episioce'lē, in women, when they extend to the labia majora. 2. Crural or Femoral Hernia, Me'roce'lē, when they issue by the crural canal. 3. Infra-Pu'bian Hernia, (F.) Hernie sous-pubienne, Oödeoce'lē, Opeoce'lē, Opodeoce'lē, Her'nia foram'inis ova'lis, when the viscera escape through the opening, which gives passage to the infra-pubian vessels. 4. Ischiat'ic Hernia; when it takes place through the sacro-sciatic notch. 5. Umbil'ical Hernia, Exom'phalos, Omphaloce'lē; when it occurs at the umbilicus or near it. 6. Epigas'tric Hernia; — occurring through the linea alba, above the umbilicus. 7. Hypogastric or Infra-umbil'ical Hernia, Coeliocе'lē, Hypogastroce'lē, — when it occurs through the linea alba below the umbilicus. 8. Perine'al Hernia, Mesosceloce'lē, Her'nia perinæ'i, Perinæocе'le, Perineoce'lē — when it takes place through the levator ani, and appears at the perineum. 9. Vag''inal Hernia, Coleoce'lē seu Elytroce'lē — through the parieties of the vagina. 10. Diaphragmat'ic Hernia, Diaphragmatoce'lē; when it passes through the diaphragm.

Herniæ are likewise distinguished,—according to the viscera forming them, — into Enteroce'lē, Epiploce'lē, En'tero-epiploce'lē, Gastroce'lē, Cystoce'lē, Hepatoce'lē, Splenoce'lē, &c.

When a hernia can be restored to its natural cavity, by the aid of pressure, &c., properly applied, it is said to be reducible. It is, on the contrary, irreducible, when adhesion, bulk, &c., oppose its return. When the aperture, which has given passage to the hernia, occasions more or less constriction on the protruded portion, the hernia is said to be incar'cerated or stran'gulated; and, if the constriction be not removed, constipation, hiccough, vomiting, and all the signs of violent inflammation, followed by gangrene, supervene, with alteration of the features, small pulse, cold extremities, and death.

The therapeutical indications are, — 1. As regards reducible hernia: — to replace the viscera in the abdomen by the taxis; and to retain them there by the use of a truss, which, if properly adapted, may effect a radical cure. 2. As regards irreducible hernia: — to support the tumour by an appropriate suspensory bandage. 3. As regards strangulated hernia:—to have recourse to the taxis; blood-letting; warm bath; tobacco glysters; ice to the tumour; and, if these should not succeed, to perform an operation, which consists in dividing the covering of the hernia, and cutting the aponeurotic ring, which causes the strangulation; — reducing the displaced viscera, unless their diseased condition should require them to be retained without;—dressing the wound appropriately:—restoring the course of the fæces by means of gentle glysters—preventing or combating inflammation of the abdominal viscera;—conducting the wound to cicatrization, by appropriate means; and afterwards supporting the cicatrix by a bandage.

The word hernia was also used, of old, for the scrotum, and, not unfrequently, for the testicle.

Swelling and inflammation of the testicle is a common sympton of gonorrhœa. (F.) Chaudepisse tombée dans les Bourses; but it may arise from external injuries, or from other causes. It is a disease which cannot be mistaken, and the treatment must obviously be strongly antiphlogistic, supporting the testicle during the treatment, and for some time afterwards: methodical compression has also been found useful. The disease is not generally of a serious character, going off as suddenly as it comes on. As it affects the epididymis more especially, when supervening on gonorrhœa or blennorrhœa, it is sometimes termed blenorrhag''ic epididymi'tis.

HERPES, Erpes, Herpe'don, Herpen, Serpens, from 'ερπω, 'I creep;' because it creeps and spreads about the skin; Ecphly'sis Herpes, Cytis'ma Herpes, Tetter, Fret, (F.) Dartre, Olophlyctide. A vesicular disease, which, in most of its forms, passes through a regular course of increase, maturation, decline, and termination, in from 10 to 14 days. The vesicles arise in distinct, but irregular clusters, which commonly appear in quick succession, and near together, on an inflamed base; generally attended with heat, pain, and considerable constitutional disorder. The term, like all others which refer to cutaneous diseases, has not been accurately defined. The ancients had three varieties: the miliary, κεγχριαιος; vesicular, φλυκταινωδης, and ero'ding, εωδιομενος. Bateman has the following varieties: 1. Herpes Phlyctænodes, Herpes milia'ris, Ecphly'sis Herpes Milia'ris, Nirles, (F.) Dartre phlyctenoïde, in which the vesicles are millet-sized; pellucid; clusters commencing on an uncertain part of the body, and being progressively strewed over the rest of the surface; succeeded by fresh crops. 2. Herpes Circina'tus, Formi'ca ambulato'ria, An'nulus re'pens, Herpes Serpi'go, Serpi'go, Ecphly'sis Herpes Circina'tus, Ringworm, Vesic'ular Ringworm, consisting of vesicles with a reddish base, uniting in rings; the area of the rings slightly discoloured, often followed by fresh crops. 4. Herpes Labia'lis, and 5. Herpes Præputia'lis, Aphthæ præpu'tii, Ulcus'cula præpu'tii, appearing, respectively, on the lips and prepuce. 6. Herpes Iris, Iris, Rainbow-worm, occurring in small circular patches, each of which is composed of concentric rings of different colours. To these may be added, Herpes Ex'edens, H. esthiom'enus seu depascens seu ferus seu estiom'enus seu ferox, Ecphly'sis Herpes ex'edens, Darta excoriati'va seu malig'na, Lupus non exedens, Formi'ca corrosi'va, Formix, Pap'ula fera, Ul'cerative Ringworm, A'gria, (F.) Dartre rongeante, in which the vesicles are hard; clusters thronged; fluid dense, yellow or reddish, hot, acrid, corroding the subjacent skin, and spreading in serpentine trails.

All the varieties demand simply an antiphlogistic treatment, when attended with febrile irritation. The herpes circinatus, alone, requires the use of astringent applications which have the power of repressing the eruption.

He is, also, the only animal whose incisor teeth, wedged in a projecting jaw, are absolutely vertical. Man is especially distinguished from other mammalia by the faculty, which he possesses, of classing his ideas; comparing them with each other; and connecting, representing, and transmitting them by signs and articulate sounds. He possesses, in the highest degree, all the attributes of intelligence,—memory, judgment, and imagination. He inhabits all countries,—the burning regions of the torrid zone, and the chilling atmosphere of the polar climes. In different situations, he presents, in his figure, colour, and stature, differences which have caused mankind to be divided by naturalists into races or varieties. The number of such races can only be approximated. Blumenbach admits five, the Caucasian, Ethiopian, Mongolian, Malay, and American. Every division must necessarily be arbitrary, and the individuals composing each variety are far from being alike.

Hospital gangrene — many different varieties of which are met with, and always accompanied or preceded by fever — commonly commences with suppression of the wound, which becomes covered with a grayish and tenacious sanies. The gangrene then manifests itself. It extends from the centre of the ulcerated surface towards the edges; these become swollen, painful, and everted; and the patient dies with all the signs of typhus. The treatment must be varied according to circumstances. Sometimes, it requires the use of stimulating, acid, caustic, and antiseptic applications; with, occasionally, the actual cautery, aided by the exhibition of tonics, internally: — at others, the antiphlogistic regimen and emollient applications may be necessary.

HU'MORISM, Hu'moral Pathol'ogy, Patholog''ia humera'lis. A medical theory, founded exclusively on the parts which the humours were considered to play in the production of disease. Although traces of this system may be found in the most remote antiquity, the creation, or, at all events, the arrangement of it may be attributed to Galen, who enveloped it in metaphysical subtleties relating to the union between the elements and the four cardinal humours.

HU'MORISTS. The Galenical and other physicians, who attributed all diseases to the depraved state of the humours, or to vicious juices collected in the body.

HUMOUR, Humor, Hygra'sia, Hygre'don, Hygrum. Every fluid substance of an organized body; — as the blood, chyle, lymph, &c. The Humours, χυμοι, Chymi, Humo'res, differ considerably as to number and quality in the different species of organized beings; and even in the same species, according to the state of health or disease. The ancients reduced them to four; which they called cardinal humours:—the blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and atrabilis or black bile. A modern classification of the humours is given under Fluid.

Hy'aloid Membrane, Tu'nica Hyaloïde'a seu Vit'rea, Membra'na Arachnoïde'a, is the extremely delicate membrane, which forms the exterior covering of the vitreous humour, and transmits within it prolongations, which divide it into cells. Fallopius discovered this membrane, and gave it the name Hyaloid. On a level with the entrance of the optic nerve into the eye, the hyaloid membrane has been described as forming, by reflection, a cylindrical canal, which pierces the vitreous humour from behind to before, as far as the posterior part of the crystalline. See Canal, hyaloid. At its anterior part is a depression —

This name was long given to every encysted tumour which contained an aqueous and transparent fluid. Many pathologists subsequently applied it to vesicles, softer than the tissue of membranes, more or less transparent, which are developed within organs, but without adhering to their tissues. It is by no means clear that these formations are really entozoa. They have been found in various parts of the body; sometimes in the uterus, occasioning signs nearly similar to those of pregnancy, but being sooner or later expelled. The expulsion is generally attended with more or less hemorrhage. See Acephalocystis.

It is used as an antisyphilitic eutrophic in venereal complaints, old cutaneous affections, &c. Gr. ij to Oj of water is a good gargle in venereal sore-throats, or an injection in gonorrhœa. Externally, it is applied in cases of tetter, and to destroy fungus, or stimulate old ulcers. Dose, gr. 1-16 to gr. 1-8, in pill, once in twenty-four hours. S. g., when liquid, 13.568 (Cavendish); easily oxydized. Metallic quicksilver does not act on the body, even when taken into the stomach. When oxydized, and combined with acids, it acts powerfully. It has been exhibited in cases of constriction of the bowels and in intussusception, from a notion that it must certainly pass through the bowels by its gravity. The water, in which mercury has been boiled, has been recommended as a vermifuge; but it probably enjoys no such property, as chemical tests do not exhibit the presence of the metal. When the crude metal is distilled in an iron retort, it forms the Hydrar'gyrum purifica'tum.

HYDROCE'LĒ, Hydrops Scroti seu testiculo'rum, Hydroschococe'lē, Hydatoce'le, Hydros'cheum, Hydror'chis, Hydroschéonie, (Alibert,) from 'ὑδωρ, 'water,' and κηλη, 'a tumour.' A term generally applied to a collection of serous fluid in the areolar texture of the scrotum or in some of the coverings, either of the testicle or spermatic cord. To the first of these varieties the names — External Hydrocele, H. œdemato'des, (F.) H. par infiltration have been given; and to the second, those of Hydroce'lē inter'na, H. tu'nicæ vaginа'lis tes'tis, Hydrel'ytron, (F.) H. par épanchement. When the collection occurs in the envelope of the testicle, it is called H. of the tunica vaginalis; and the epithet congenital is added, when the interior of the membrane, in which it is situate, still communicates freely with the cavity of the abdomen. When it exists in the spermatic chord, it is called encysted, or diffused Hydrocele of the spermatic cord, as the case may be. The tumour of the distended scrotum is oblong: greater below than above; indolent and semi-transparent. When it becomes inconveniently large, the fluid may be evacuated by puncturing with a trocar, but, as it collects again, this operation can only be considered palliative. The radical cure consists, usually, in injecting, through the canula of the trocar, which has been left in, after puncturing, some irritating liquid, as wine. This is kept in the tunica vaginalis for a few minutes, and then withdrawn. The coat inflames; adhesion takes place, and the cavity is obliterated.

of existence, and the accumulation of fluid gradually produces distension of the brain, and of the skull, with separation of the sutures. It commonly proves fatal before puberty.

HYDROCEPHALUS EXTERNUS, Œde'ma cap'itis, Cephalœde'ma of some, is a mere infiltration into the subcutaneous cellular tissue of the cranium.

It is observed particularly in childhood. Its march is extremely acute and often very rapid; admitting, generally, however, of division into three stages. The symptoms of the first stage are those of general febrile irritation, with head-ache, intolerance of light and sound, delirium, &c. Those of the second, which generally denote that the inflammation has ended in effusion, are, great slowness of pulse, crying out as if in distress, moaning, dilated pupil, squinting, &c.; and lastly, in the third stage—profound stupor, paralysis, convulsions, involuntary evacuations, quick pulse, and frequently death. The disease is of uncertain duration; sometimes, destroying in two or three days; at others, extending to two or three weeks. The prognosis is unfavourable. The treatment must be active during the stage of excitement,—precisely that which is necessary in phrenitis. In the second stage, the indication is;—to promote the absorption of the effused fluid. This must be done by counter-irritants, and mercury, chiefly. On dissection, water is generally found in the ventricles, or at the base of the brain; or there are evidences of previous vascular excitement, as effusions of coagulable lymph, &c.

HYDROCYAN'IC ACID, Ac''idum Hydrocyan'icum; from ὑδωρ, 'water,' and κυανος, 'blue. Prussic Acid, Ac''idum Prus'sicum seu Borus'sicum seu Zoët'icum seu Zoëtin'icum, Cyanohy'dric or Cyanhy'dric Acid, (F.) Acide Hydrocyanique ou Prussique. This acid exists in a great variety of native combinations in the vegetable kingdom, and imparts to them certain properties, which have been long known and esteemed; as in the bitter almond, cherry laurel, leaves of the peach tree, kernels of fruit, pips of apples, &c. When concentrated, it is liquid, colourless, of a strong smell and taste, at first cool, afterwards burning. Its s. g. at 7° Centigrade, is 0.7058. It is very volatile, and enters into ebullition at 80° Fahr. It speedily undergoes decomposition, sometimes in less than an hour, and consists of a peculiar gazeous and highly inflammable compound of carbon and azote, to which the name Cyan'ogen has been assigned; and of hydrogen, which acts as the acidifying principle: hence its name Hydrocyanic acid. In the Pharmacopœia of the United States, (1851,) two formulæ for the preparation of the Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum dilu'tum—Ac''idum hydrocyan'icum, Ph. U. S. of 1842—are given; the one from the Ferro-cyanuret of Potassium; the other from the Cyanuret of Silver. According to Magendie, the acid, prepared after Scheele's method—the one in common use—is of irregular medicinal power: he, therefore, recommends Gay Lussac's acid, diluted with 6 times its volume, or 8.5 times its weight of distilled water, for medicinal purposes, and this he calls Medic''inal Prussic Acid. Dr. Ure has proposed, that the specific gravity should indicate that which is proper for medicinal exhibition; and, after comparative experiments of the gravity of the acids, obtained by different processes, he states, that the acid, usually prescribed, is of s. g. 0.996 or 0.997. Great caution is, however, necessary. One drop of pure prussic acid may instantly destroy, and the animal show hardly any traces of irritability, a few moments after death. It has been advised in laryngeal phthisis, in pulmonary phthisis, pulmonary inflammation and irritation, dyspepsia, uterine affections, hectic cough, cancer, chronic rheumatism, and mania, and as a local remedy in impetiginous affections; but, although possessed of powerful sedative properties, it is so unmanageable and the preparation so uncertain, that it is not much used. The Dose of Scheele's Acid, or of the Medicinal Prussic Acid, is from a quarter of a drop to two drops.

The term Rabies is more appropriate for the aggregate of symptoms resulting from the bite of rabid animals. Hydrophobia literally signifies a 'dread of water;' and, consequently, ought to be applied to one of the symptoms of rabies, rather than to the disease itself. It is a symptom which appears occasionally in other nervous affections. Rabies is susceptible of spontaneous development in the dog, wolf, cat, and fox, which can thence transmit it to other quadrupeds or to man; but it has not been proved that it can supervene,—without their having been previously bitten,—in animals of other species; or that the latter can, when bitten, communicate it to others. Many facts induce the belief, that the saliva and bronchial mucus are the sole vehicles of the rabid virus; the effects of which upon the economy sometimes appear almost immediately after the bite, and are, at others, apparently dormant for a considerable period. The chief symptoms are—a sense of dryness and constriction of the throat; excessive thirst; difficult deglutition; aversion for, and horror at, the sight of liquids as well as of brilliant objects; red, animated countenance; great nervous irritability; frothy saliva; grinding of the teeth, &c. Death most commonly happens before the fifth day. Hydrophobia has hitherto resisted all therapeutical means. Those which allay irritation are obviously most called for. In the way of prevention, the bitten part should always be excised, where practicable; and cauterized.

In some cases, symptoms like those which follow the bite of a rabid animal are said to have come on spontaneously. This affection has been termed nervous or spontaneous hydrophobia.

HYDROPHOBUS, Lyssodectus.

In the former case, the iris is concave anteriorly, and pushed backwards: — in the latter, it is convex, and pushed forwards. Most commonly, the disease seems to depend on both humours at the same time. Hydrophthalmia sometimes affects both eyes; at others, only one. Children are more exposed to it than adults or old persons. The treatment must vary according to the cause; its longer or shorter duration; greater or less extent, &c. Hence, according to circumstances, hydragogue medicines, purgatives, general and local blood-letting, blisters, setons, moxa, cupping-glasses, fomentations, collyria, and fumigations of different kinds, have been employed. When all means fail, and the disease continues to make progress, the fluid may be evacuated, by a puncture made with a cataract needle at the lower part of the transparent cornea.

A preternatural collection of a serous fluid in any cavity of the body, or in the areolar texture. When the areolar texture of the whole body is more or less filled with fluid, the disease is called Anasar'ca or Leucophlegma'tia;—and when this variety is local or partial, it is called Œde'ma. The chief dropsies, designated from their seat, are:—Anasarca, Hydrocephalus, Hydrorachitis, Hydrothorax, Hydropericardium, Ascites, Hydrometra, Hydrocele, &c.

Encyst'ed Dropsy, Hydrops sacca'tus, incarcera'tus seu cys'ticus, is that variety in which the fluid is enclosed in a sac or cyst; so that it has no communication with the surrounding parts. Dropsy of the Ovarium, Hydrops seu Asci'tes Ova'rii, Asci'tes sacca'tus, is an instance of this variety.

Dropsy may be active or passive. The former consists in an increased action of the exhalants, so that those vessels pour out much more fluid than is absorbed: the latter arises from a state of atony of the absorbent vessels, which allows of an accumulation of fluid. It may also be mechanical, or produced by obstructions to the circulation, as in cases of diseased liver. Active dropsy, occurring accidentally in a sound individual, generally ends favourably. That which supervenes on other diseases, or is symptomatic of some internal affection, is rarely curable.

The treatment consists in the use of all those remedies which act on the various secretions: so that, the demand being increased, the supply will have to be increased accordingly; and in this manner some of the collected fluid may be taken up by the absorbents. To this end bleeding, if the dropsy be very active; purgatives, diuretics, sudorifics, sialogogues, &c., are the remedies chiefly depended upon.

An effusion of serum, often owing to inflammation of the spinal membranes—myeli'tis exsudati'va—and forming a soft, frequently transparent, tumour, constituted of the membranes of the spinal marrow, which are distended and projecting backwards from the vertebral canal, the posterior paries of which, when the affection is congenital, is wanting to a certain extent—Spina bif'ida, Atelorachid'ia, Hydrora'chis dehis'cens seu congen'ita, Schistorrha'chis, Spi'nola. The disease is often accompanied with paralysis of the lower extremities. It is congenital, and situate in the lumbar or sacral regions. It is almost always fatal:—the tumour rupturing, and death occurring instantaneously. On dissection, a simple separation or complete absence of the spinous processes of the vertebræ is perceived, with, at times, destruction or absence of spinal marrow. The treatment is the same as in hydrocephalus chronicus; and, as in it, advantage seems occasionally to have been derived by puncturing with a fine needle.

Idiopathic hydrothorax, termed, by Laënnec, Hydropisie des plèvres, Dropsy of the Pleuræ,—by Piorry, Hydropleurie,—is a rare disease, and difficult of diagnosis. It generally exists only on one side, which, if the fluid effused be considerable, projects more than the other. Dyspnœa, and fluctuation perceptible to the ear, are characteristic symptoms. When the chest is examined with the stethoscope, respiration is found to be wanting every where, except at the root of the lung. The sound is also dull on percussion.

Effusion into the chest, as a result of inflammation of some thoracic viscus, is as common as the other is rare. It is usually a fatal symptom. It has been called symptomatic hydrothorax.

In hydrothorax, the course of treatment proper in dropsies in general must be adopted. Diuretics seem, here, to be especially useful: probably on account of the great activity of pulmonary absorption. Paracentesis can rarely be serviceable.

This membrane is ordinarily ruptured by the first venereal act, and is effaced by accouchement; some irregular flaps remaining, to which the name Carun'culæ Myrtifor'mes has been given by reason of their resemblance to the leaves of the myrtle. Many circumstances of an innocent character may occasion a rupture or destruction of this membrane. It is often, indeed, found absent in children soon after birth; whilst it may remain entire after copulation. Hence the presence of the hymen does not absolutely prove virginity; nor does its absence prove incontinence; although its presence would be primâ facie evidence of continence.

This disease is probably so called, from the circumstance of some hypochondriacs having felt an uneasy sensation in the hypochondriac regions. The disease seems really to be, as Pinel has classed it, a species of nenrosis, and of mental alienation, which is observed in persons who in other respects are of sound judgment, but who reason erroneously on whatever concerns their own health. Hypochondriasis is characterized by disordered digestion, without fever or local lesion; flatulence; borborygmi; extreme increase of sensibility; palpitations; illusions of the senses; a succession of morbid feelings, which appear to simulate the greater part of diseases; panics; exaggerated uneasiness of various kinds; chiefly in what regards the health, &c. Indigestion has usually been considered the cause of hypochondriasis. They are, unquestionably, much connected with each other: but there is every reason to believe, that the seat of the affection is really, though functionally, in the brain. The disease almost always appears at the adult age, most commonly in irritable individuals; and in those exhausted, or rather in the habit of being exhausted by mental labour, overwhelmed with domestic or public affairs, &c.

The treatment is almost entirely moral. The condition of the digestive function must, however, be accurately attended to.

It arises by ten or twelve very fine filaments from the grooves, which separate the corpora pyramidalia from the C. olivaria; issues from the cranium by the foramen condyloideum anterius; and divides, near the angle of the jaw, into two branches; the one, the cervica'lis descendens or descen'dens noni. The animal is in the habit of evacuating the urine at one spot, where its aqueous parts evaporate in the sun — the more tenacious adhering to the rock and hardening.

In smell, and medical properties, it most resembles castor, which, according to Dr. Pappe, it may replace. It is used by the Cape farmers in nervous and spasmodic affections.

A species of neurosis, classed amongst the spasmi by Sauvages and Cullen, and in the Névroses de la génération, by Pinel. It received the name of hysteria, because it was reputed to have its seat in the uterus. It generally occurs in paroxysms; the principal characters of which consist in alternate fits of laughing and crying, with a sensation as if a ball set out from the uterus and ascended towards the stomach, chest, and neck, producing a sense of strangulation. If the attack be violent, there is, sometimes, loss of consciousness (although the presence of consciousness generally distinguishes it from epilepsy) and convulsions. The duration of the attacks is very variable. It appears to be dependent upon irregularity of nervous distribution in very impressible persons, and is not confined to the female; for well-marked cases of hysteria are occasionally met with in men. During the fit,—dashing cold water on the face, stimulants applied to the nose, or exhibited internally, and antispasmodics, form the therapeutical agents. Exercise, tranquillity of mind, amusing and agreeable occupations constitute the prophylactics. See Mania, dancing.

The filtered and evaporated product is then dissolved in alcohol; and the mixture filtered and evaporated in shallow vessels.

ILIAC, Ili'acus, Il'ial, (F.) Iliaque, from Ilia, 'the flanks.' Relating to, or connected with, the flanks.

ILIAC ARTERIES, Arte'riæ Ili'acæ. This term has been given to several arteries. The Primary Iliacs, (F.) A. Iliaques primitives,—Pelvicrurales, (Ch.) arise from the bifurcation of the aorta, opposite the body of the 4th lumbar vertebra, and descend, in a divergent manner; until, opposite the sacro-iliac symphysis, they divide into two considerable trunks,—the internal Iliac or hypogastric (which see), and the external Iliac—Portion Iliaque de la crurale, (Ch.) This proceeds from the sacro-iliac juncture as far as the crural arch, when it assumes the name Femoral Artery. Before passing under the arch it gives off two pretty considerable branches,—the Epigastric, and the Circumflexa Ilii. This last, which is called, also, anterior Iliac by some anatomists,—Circonflexe de l'Ilium (Ch.); leaves the external iliac at the crural arch. It ascends along the outer edge of the iliacus muscle, and divides into two branches—an internal and an external.

The Iliaca Inter'na Minor seu Ilio lumbal'is is a small artery, which sometimes arises from the hypogastric; at others, from the beginning of the gluteal. It is sent, chiefly, to the psoas and iliacus internus muscles.

ILIAC CREST, Crista Il'ii, is the upper margin of the ilium. (F.) Crête Iliaque. It is very thick, and curved like the Italic S. It affords attachment to the broad muscles of the abdomen.

ILIAC FOSSÆ are two in number; the internal, the depression presented by the ilium on its interior, and at the upper part in which the Iliacus internus is lodged:—and the external, an excavation on the outer surface of the same bone, occupied by the Glutæi muscles.

ILIAC MUSCLE, INTERNAL, Ili'acus internus Muscle, Iliacus, Iliaco-trochantérien (Ch.); Femur moven'tium sep'timus, Iliac muscle, is situate in the fossa iliaca, and at the anterior and superior part of the thigh. It is broad, radiated, triangular; and is attached, above, to the two upper thirds of the fossa iliaca, and to the internal part of the iliac crest:—below, it terminates by a tendon, which is common to it and the psoas magnus, and is fixed into the lesser trochanter. When this muscle contracts, it bends the pelvis on the thigh, and conversely. It is also a rotator of the thigh outwards, and prevents the trunk from falling backwards.

ILIAC PASSION, Ileus.

ILIAC REGIONS, Regio'nes ili'acæ, Inan'ia, are the sides of the abdomen between the ribs and the hips.

ILIAC SPINES, Spinous Proc''esses of the Ilium, are four in number. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. Of the anterior, one is superior. It bounds the crista ilii anteriorly, and affords origin to the sartorius muscle. The other is inferior, and receives the tendinous origin of the rectus femoris.

The two Posterior Iliac Spines are divided, like the anterior, into superior and inferior. They afford insertion to strong ligaments, which unite the ilium with the sacrum.

IL'ION, Il'ium, Il'eum, Haunch bone. The largest of the three bones which constitute the os innominatum in the fœtus and child. It was probably so called from its seeming to support the intestine ilion; or, perhaps, because its crest is curved upon itself, from ειλεω, 'I twist,' 'I roll.' This portion of the os innominatum is usually so called in the adult. The posterior surface is called Dorsum, the internal Venter. The upper semicircular edge is the Crista or Spine, at the anterior part of which is the anterior and superior spinous process; and, below, the anterior and inferior spinous process. INFLAMMA'TION, Inflamma'tio, from in, and flamma, 'flame,' 'fire;' Phleg'monê, Phlogo'sis, Ecphlogo'sis, Epiphleg''ia, Exap'sis, Phlegma'sia, Causo'ma, Empres'ma, Phlo'gia, Hyperendosmose (Dutrochet), Incen'dium, Hyperhæmato'sis, Hyperæ'mia acti'va, Phleboplero'sis ecphrac'tica, (F.) Augiite, is so called in consequence of the acute or burning pain felt in a part affected with it. An irritation in a part of the body is occasioned by some stimulus;—owing to which the blood flows into the capillary vessels in greater abundance than natural, and those vessels become over-dilated and enfeebled; whence result pain, redness, heat, tension, and swelling; symptoms which appear in greater or less severity, according to the structure, vital properties, and functions of the part affected, and its connexion with other parts, as well as according to the constitution of the individual.

Simple accumulation of blood in the capillaries of the part is hyperæmia, not inflammation. The latter requires, in addition, altered nutrition either of the vessels themselves, or of the surrounding tissues, or of both.

The inflammations of the areolar and serous membranes greatly agree;—and those of the mucous and skin; the former being more active, and constituting the phlegmonous variety;—the latter, the erythematic or erysipelatous. Of this variety is the diffusive inflammation produced by morbid poisons,—as during dissection, where solutions of continuity exist on the fingers of the operator. It is seen, too, in workers in bone, and hence has been called bone fever. Preparatory to the turning of bones, it is customary to macerate them in water. The fluid soon becomes putrid, and if the hands be kept in it diffusive inflammation results. Inflammation may end by resolution, suppuration, gangrene, adhesion, effusion, or induration. Each of the inflammations of internal organs has received a name according to the organ affected;—as, gastritis, cephalitis, enteritis, hepatitis, &c. Besides the above inflammations, it has been considered, that there is an instinctive kind established for the union of parts which have been divided, whether the union takes place immediately, or by the aid of an intermediate body. This is the adhesive inflammation of some; but it may well be questioned whether inflammation is ever desirable in such cases. See Adhesion, Callus, Cicatrix. Broussais considered that the term inflammation should include every local exaltation of the organic movements which is sufficiently great to disturb the harmony of the functions, and disorganize the texture in which it is situate. He farther extended the name inflammation to irritations which do not induce disorganization of the textures, and which had been previously, and are still, called fevers.

Examination of the blood drawn always exhibits an increase of the fibrinous elements—the average proportion of which, in healthy blood, is about three in the thousand. In inflammation, it at times rises as high as ten. In fevers unaccompanied with inflammation, the proportion is natural, or below the average; but whenever inflammation supervenes, it immediately rises.

External inflammation is easily detected by the characters already mentioned:—internal, by disturbance of function and pain upon pressure; but the last sign is often not available. Both forms require the removal of all irritation, and the reduction of vascular excitement and nervous irritability; hence, blood-letting—local and general—sedatives, refrigerants, and counter-irritants become valuable remedies in almost all cases of inflammation.

Inflammation is not always of the active kind. There is a form, Inflamma'tio debi'lis, which occurs in low conditions of the system, and in broken down constitutions, which, like many forms of chronic inflammation, requires a stimulant, rather than a sedative, mode of treatment.

It is only, properly speaking, a line that extends from the anterior and superior spinous process of the ilium to the middle part of the horizontal ramus of the pubis. Also, the genital organs.

IN'GUINAL, Inguina'lis, from inguen, inguinis, 'the groin.' Belonging or relating to the groin. This epithet has been given to various parts met with in the region of the groin or inguinal region.

INGUINAL ARTERY is that portion of the femoral artery situate immediately beneath the crural arch in the inguinal region.

INGUINAL CANAL is a canal, about two inches in length, proceeding obliquely downwards, inwards and forwards at the lower part of the abdomen; through which passes the spermatic cord, in men, and the round ligament of the uterus in women. This canal is formed, inferiorly and anteriorly, by the aponeurosis of the greater oblique muscle; posteriorly by the fascia transversalis, which is joined to the preceding aponeurosis, and forms with it a deep channel, into which are received the lesser oblique and transversalis muscles. The inguinal canal has two apertures; the one, the lower and inner, is called the inguinal or abdominal ring. It is bounded by two strong tendinous pillars which fix it—the innermost to the symphysis, the outermost to the spine of the pubis. The upper and outer aperture is formed by the fascia transversalis. From the edge of this aperture arises a membranous funnel,—a prolongation of the fascia transversalis,—which receives the spermatic vessels; forms their proper sheath, and accompanies them as far as the testicle. On its inside lies the epigastric artery Above it, is the lower edge of the transversalis muscle: and, below, it is bounded by the channel of the greater oblique. By following the oblique direction of this canal, and passing, consequently, on the outside of the epigastric artery, the viscera are displaced, so as to constitute internal inguinal hernia.

INGUINAL RE'GION, Re'gio inguina'lis, Bubo, Inguen. The region of the groin.

INGUINAL RING, Abdom'inal Ring, An'nulus abdom'inis, (F.) Anneau Inguinal, is the inferior aperture of the inguinal canal.

IN'GUINO-CUTA'NEUS. A name given by Professor Chaussier to the middle ramus of the anterior branch of the first lumbar nerve, because it sends its numerous filaments to the groin, scrotum, and to the skin of the superior part of the thigh.

INHÆRENS, Inherent.

INHALATIO, Absorption, Inhalation—i. Cutis, see Absorption.

INHALA'TION, Inhala'tio; from in, and halare, 'to breathe.' The act of drawing air or vapour into the lungs — Inhala'tio pulmona'lis. Also, absorption.

INHA'LER. Same etymon. An apparatus for inhalation. Mudge's Inhaler is an apparatus for inhaling the steam of hot water, in affections of the air-passages. It consists of a pewter tankard provided with a lid, into which a flexible tube is inserted. Through this the vapour is inhaled.

INHE'RENT, Inhærens, (in, and hæreo, 'I stick.') That which adheres, or which is joined or united to any thing.

INHERENT CAUTERY, (F.) Cautère inhérent, is the actual cautery, left in contact with a part until it is reduced to the state of a deep eschar.

INIAD, see Inial.

IN'IAL, from ινιον, 'the nape of the neck.' An epithet, proposed by Dr. Barclay, for an aspect towards the plane of the ridge of the occiput. Iniad is employed by him adverbially to signify 'towards the inial aspect.'

INIENCEPH'ALUS, (F.) Iniencéphale, from ινιον, 'occiput,' and εγκεφαλος, 'encephalon.' A monster whose encephalon is in great part in the cranium, and in part out of it, behind, and a little beneath the cranium, which is open in its occipital portion.—I. G. St. Hilaire.

INIODYMUS, Diprosopus.

INION, ινιον. Some of the Greek physicians give this name to the occiput, or the ridge of the occiput; others to the back part of the neck, and the muscles of the occiput. Blancard says it is the commencement of the spinal marrow.

INIOPS, Iniope, from ινιον, 'occiput,' and ωψ, 'the eye, face.' A monster, double above the umbilicus, which has two ears very near each other, or only one median ear, and above it, at a greater or less distance, a median orbit and eye, more or less imperfect. The rudimental face appearing to be directly opposite the principal face suggested the name.—I. G. St. Hilaire.

INJACULA'TIO, (in, and jaculor, jaculatus, 'to shoot.') A term employed by Van Helmont to designate an acute pain of the stomach, with rigidity and immobility of the body.

INJECT'ED, Injec'tus, from injicere, injectum, (in, and jacere, 'to throw into.') The face and other parts are said to be injected, when the accumulation of blood in the capillary vessels gives them an evident red colour. A subject or part of a subject is also said to be injected, when its vessels have been filled, by the anatomist, with an appropriate composition.

INJEC'TION, Injec'tio, Eis'bolē: same etymon. The act of introducing, by means of a syringe or other instrument, a liquid into a cavity of the body. The liquid injected is also called an injection. Anatomists use injections — Injectio'nes anatom'icæ — for filling the cavities of vessels, in order that they may be rendered more apparent, and their dissection be facilitated. For this purpose, they employ syringes of different dimensions, and various materials. The most common injections are made of soot, wax, and turpentine, coloured with lamp-black, vermillion, &c. There are three kinds chiefly used by anatomists, — the coarse, the fine, and the minute. The following are formulæ for each.

In order to inject the arteries, the injection must be forced from the great trunks towards their ultimate ramifications. To inject the veins, on the contrary, it is indispensable, on account of their valves, to send the injection from the smaller divisions towards the greater. The lymphatics are usually injected with mercury. The practitioner injects, by forcing with a syringe, liquids, such as emollient, narcotic, stimulant, and other decoctions or infusions, into different hollow organs, as the rectum, vagina, nasal fossæ, urethra, tunica vaginalis, auditory canal, &c., to fulfil various therapeutical indications.

The following injection has been strongly recommended by Dr. Horner to preserve the dead body.

Take of Liverpool, St. Ubes, or Turk's Island Salt,	oz.	36 avoird.
Nitrate of potassa,	"	19
Carbonate of Soda,	"	8
Molasses (Sugar-house,)	"	4 by meas.
Water,		six pints.

The saline constituents to be dissolved first of all in boiling hot water; the molasses to be afterwards stirred in; the starch to be mixed well with half a pint of cold water, and then to be stirred in with the other articles. As soon as it begins to boil, the whole mass swells up, when it must be removed from the fire. On the proper reduction of temperature it is fit for use.

The same vein of the left side is very large. It communicates with the demi-azygos, receives the left bronchial vein, and opens into the corresponding subclavian. The right inferior intercostal veins open into the vena azygos; and those of the left into the demiazygos.

INTERMIT'TENT, Intermit'tens. Same etymon. That which has intermissions.

INTERMITTENT FEVER, Febris intermit'tens, Dialeip'syra, Intermittens, An'etus, Pyretotypo'sis, Ague, Ague and Fever, Fever and Ague, Palu'dal or Period'ic Fever, (PROV.) Agah, Cold-chill, Shaking, Shakes, (Old Eng.) Aksis, Auggere, Axes, (F.) Fièvre intermittente, F. d'Accès, F. des marais, F. Périodique, is a fever consisting of paroxysms, with a complete state of apyrexia in the intervals. The chief types are the Quotidian, Tertian, and Quartan. The symptoms of intermittents are those of a decided and completely marked cold stage: (F.) Stade de froid, attended with paleness; collapse; impaired sensibility; and coldness, more or less diffused, followed by general rigors. After this occurs the hot stage; Stade de la Chaleur, the heat returning partially and irregularly, and at length becoming universal, and much above the standard of health. The pulse is now hard and strong; tongue white; urine high-coloured; thirst considerable. At length, the sweating stage, (F.) Stade de Sueur, makes its appearance; the moisture usually beginning on the forehead, face, and neck, and soon extending universally; the heat abating; thirst ceasing; the urine throwing down a sediment, and the functions being gradually restored to their wonted state. The tertian type is the most common, and the quartan the most severe. The quotidian more readily changes into a remittent and continued fever. The quartan has, generally, the longest cold stage, the tertian the longest hot. The chief exciting cause is marsh miasmata. Ague, also, occurs in districts where there are no marshy emanations. Such districts are, generally, of a volcanic nature; further we know not. When the disease has once attacked an individual, it is apt to recur. The prognosis is, in general, favourable, as far as regards life; but long protracted intermittents are apt to induce visceral obstructions, and engorgements, which may end in dropsy. In some countries, the disease is of a very pernicious character. The indications of treatment are, 1. To abate the violence of the paroxysm; and, 2. To prevent its return. The first indication demands the adoption of the general principles and remedies required in ordinary fever. The second is the most important. The period of apyrexia is that for action. The means for fulfilling this indication are:— the use of emetics, purgatives, cinchona, quinia, &c., arsenic, and forcible impressions made on the mind of the patient.

INTERMUS'CULAR, Intermuscula'ris, from inter, 'between,' and musculus, 'a muscle.' That which is placed between muscles.

INTERMUSCULAR APONEURO'SES are aponeurotic laminæ or septa, situate between muscles, to which they often give attachment.

INTER'NAL, Inner, Inter'nus. That which is placed on the inside. This epithet is given to parts that look towards an imaginary central plane, which divides the body into two equal and symmetrical portions, as well as to those which correspond with a cavity. Thus, we say—the internal or inner surface of the arm or thigh, skull, &c.

INTERNAL DISEASES, Morbi inter'ni, are those which occupy the inner parts of the body. Their investigation belongs to the physician; external diseases falling under the management of the surgeon.

INTERNAT. The post or office of an interne.

INTEROS'SEOUS, Interos'seus. That which is situate between the bones; from inter, 'between,' and os, 'a bone.'

INTEROSSEOUS AR'TERIES OF THE FOREARM AND HAND. Of these there are several. The common interosseous artery arises from the posterior part of the ulnar, a little below the bicipital tuberosity of the radius; passes backwards and divides into two branches: the one called anterior interosseous descends vertically, anterior to the interosseous ligament; the other, called posterior interosseous, passes above the ligament, appears at its posterior part and divides into two great branches, — the posterior recurrent radial and the posterior interosseous, properly so called. In the hand,—1. The dorsal metacarpal interosseous arteries are given off by the dorsalis carpi, a division of the radial artery. 2. The palmar interosseous arteries, which arise from the convexity of the deep palmar arch, and give off the middle interosseous arteries. 3. The dorsal interosseous of the index, proceeding directly from the radial artery. In the foot, are distinguished:— 1. The dorsal interosseous arteries, three in number, which arise from the artery of the metatarsus, a branch of the dorsalis tarsi. 2. The plantar interosseous arteries, which are, also, three in number, and arise from the plantar arch.

INTEROSSEOUS LIG'AMENTS. Ligaments seated between certain bones, which they unite; such are the ligaments between the radius and ulna, and between the tibia and fibula.

INTEROSSEOUS MUSCLES. These occupy the spaces between the bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus; and, consequently, belong,—some to the hand, others to the foot.

INTEROSSEOUS NERVE is a branch, given off by the median nerve, which descends before the interosseous ligament, accompanying the artery of the same name.

INTEROSSEOUS VEINS have the same arrangement as the arteries.

INTEROSSEUS MANÛS, (F.) Muscle interosseux de la main.—Métacarpo-phalangien-latéral suspalmaire et métacarpo-phalangien latéral, (Ch.) These muscles are seven in number; two for each of the three middle fingers, and one for the little finger. Four are situate on the back of the hand, and three only in the palm. They are inserted into the metacarpal bones, and send a tendon to the tendon of the extensor communis. According to their office, they are, to each finger, an adductor and an abductor. The index has a dorsal abductor and a palmar one. The middle finger has two dorsal muscles for adductor and abductor; the ring finger has a dorsal adductor and a palmar abductor; and the little finger has only one interosseous abductor, which is palmar. These muscles produce abduction and adduction of the fingers, which they can also extend, owing to their connexion with the extensor tendons.

INTEROS'SEUS PEDIS, Métatarso-phalangien-latéral, (Ch.) The number, arrangement, shape, and uses of these are the same as in the case of the preceding muscles. Four are dorsal, and three plantar: six belong to the three middle toes and one to the little toe. The great toe is devoid of them. As in the hand, they are distinguished, in each toe, into abductor and adductor.

INTERPEDUN'CULAR, Interpeduncula'ris; from inter, 'between,' and pedunculi, 'peduncles.' A term, applied to that which is placed between the peduncles of the encephalon,—as Interpeduncular space; a lozenge-shaped interval, behind the diverging peduncles or crura of the cerebrum, in which are found the posterior perforated space, corpora albicantia, tuber cinereum, or infundibulum, and pituitary body.

INTERPELLA'TUS, (Morbus,) from interpello, (inter, and pello,) 'I interrupt.' A term, by which Paracelsus designated those diseases whose progress is unequal, and paroxysms irregular.

INTERSPI'NAL LIG'AMENT, Membra'na interspina'lis, (F.) Ligament interépineux. These occupy the intervals between the spinous processes in the back and loins. In the neck, they are replaced by the muscles of the same name. They prevent the too great flexion of the spine, and keep the spinous processes in situ. The outermost thickened portions of these are, sometimes, termed Ligamen'ta a'picum.

INTERSPINA'LES COLLI, Spina'les Colli mino'res, Spina'ti, (F.) Interépineux-cervicaux, Intercervicaux, (Ch.) These are twelve in number, and occupy, in two parallel rows, the intervals between the spinous processes of the cervical vertebræ, from that of the atlas and vertebra dentata, to that between the last cervical and first dorsal vertebra. They are flat, thin, and quadrilateral. These muscles contribute to the extension of the neck and to throwing the head backwards.

INTERSPINALES DORSI ET LUMBO'RUM; portions of the Transversaire-épineux of Boyer, and the sacro-spinal of Chaussier. These muscles are of two kinds. The one (Muscle grand épineux du dos, of Winslow) representing fleshy bundles of different lengths, applied upon the lateral surfaces of the spinous processes, from the third dorsal vertebra to the second lumbar. The other (Muscle petit épineux du dos, Winslow) covered by the preceding. They are situate on each side of the interspinal ligament, in the form of small, short flat bundles, which pass from one spinous process to the second, third or fourth above it. These muscles aid in extending the vertebral column; and incline it a little to one side, when they act on one side only.

INTER'STICE, Interstit''ium, Arœo'ma, from inter, 'between,' and sto, 'I stand.' Diaste'ma, Interval'lum. Anatomists have given this name to the intervals between organs. The iliac crest, crista ilii, for example, has two lips and an interstice between them, which affords attachment to the lesser oblique muscle of the abdomen.

INTERSTICE, Pore.

INTERTRANSVERSA'LIS, Intertransversa'rius. That which is placed between the transverse processes of the vertebræ.

INTERTRANSVERSALES COLLI, (F.) Intertransversaires cervicaux, Intertrachéliens, (Ch.) These are small, muscular bundles; quadrilateral; thin and flat; situate, in pairs, in the intervals between the transverse processes of the neck, except between the first and second, where there is only one. They are distinguished into anterior and posterior. The former are six in number; the latter five. These muscles bring the transverse processes of the neck nearer each other, and contribute to the lateral flexion of the neck.

INTERTRANSVERSALES LUMBO'RUM, Musculi intertransversi lumbo'rum, (F.) Intertransversaires des lombes. These are almost entirely fleshy, and ten in number; five on each side. They are similar to the preceding in general arrangement; except that they are more marked, and not placed in two rows. Each intertransverse space contains only one. They are quadrilateral, and flat. The first occupies the space between the transverse processes of the first lumbar and the last dorsal vertebræ; and the last is between that of the fourth and fifth lumbar vertebræ. These muscles incline the lumbar region laterally; and straighten it when inclined to one side.

Their form is accommodated to that of the vertebra with which they are in connexion; so that, in the neck and loins, they are oval, whilst in the dorsal region they are nearly circular.

INTES'TINE, Intesti'num, En'teron, Chorda, Gut, Nedyïa (pl.), Pan'tices (pl.), Boel'li (pl.), Bowel, (F.) Intestin, Boyau. Same etymon. A musculo-membranous canal, variously convoluted, which extends from the stomach to the anus, and is situate in the abdominal cavity; the greater part of which it fills. In man, its length is six or eight times that of the body. It is divided into two principal portions, called small intestine and large intestine. The former, Intesti'num ten'uē, I. grac'ilē, (F.) Intestin grêle, constituting nearly four-fifths of the whole length, begins at the stomach and terminates in the right iliac region. It is divided into duodenum, jejunum and ileum. Some anatomists give the name small intestine to the last two only; which are kept in place by the mesentery, and form a large paquet, occupying the umbilical and hypogastric regions, a part of the flanks, of the iliac regions, and of the cavity of the pelvis. It is composed of, 1. A serous membrane, which is peritoneal. 2. Of a muscular coat, whose fibres are very pale, and are placed, in part, longitudinally; but the greater part transversely. 3. Of a whitish, mucous membrane; villous, and forming folds or valves—valvulæ conniventes—at its inner surface, and furnished with a number of mucous follicles, called glands of Lieberkühn, (Crypts or Follicles of Lieberkühn,) and in the duodenum with the glands of Brunner. The arteries of the small intestine proceed from the superior mesenteric; its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves proceed from the superior mesenteric plexus. The large intestine, Intesti'num crassum, Megalocœ'lia, (F.) Gros intestin, forms a sequence to the small. It is much shorter, and is solidly attached in the regions of the abdomen which it occupies. It begins in the right iliac region; ascends along the right flank, till beneath the liver, when it crosses the upper part of the abdomen, descends into the left iliac fossa, and plunges into the pelvic cavity, to gain the anus. The great intestine is usually divided into three portions,—the cæcum, colon and rectum. It receives its arteries from the superior and inferior mesenteries. Its veins open into the vena porta. Its nerves are furnished by the mesenteric plexuses. Its lymphatic vessels, which are much less numerous than those of the small intestine, pass into the ganglions or glands seated between the different reflections of the peritoneum, which fix it to the abdominal parietes. The use of the intestines is,—in the upper part, to effect the chylification of the food and the absorption of the chyle;—in the lower, to serve as a reservoir, where the excrementitious portion of the food collects; and, also, as an excretory duct, which effects its expulsion.

Generally, it is the upper part of the small intestine, which is received into the lower—intussuscip'iens—when the intussusception is said to be progres'sive. At times, however, it is ret'rograde. As the disease cannot be positively detected by the symptoms, it must be treated upon general principles. At times, the invaginated portion has separated and been voided per anum, — the patient recovering. The disease is, however, of a very dangerous character.

S., 1851), Iodin'eum, Io'dum, Io'dium, Io'nium, Io'num, (F.) Iode; from ἰωδης, viola'ceus, 'of a violet colour,' so called from the violet vapour it exhales when volatilized. It is contained in the mother waters of certain fuci, and is obtained by pouring an excess of concentrated sulphuric acid on the water obtained by burning different fuci, lixiviating the ashes and concentrating the liquor. The mixture is placed in a retort to which a receiver is attached, and is boiled. The iodine passes over and is condensed. It is solid, in the form of plates; of a bluish gray colour, of a metallic brightness, and smell similar to that of the chloride of sulphur. Its s. g. is 4.946. When heated, it becomes volatilized, and affords the vapour which characterizes it. With oxygen it forms Iodic acid, and with hydrogen Hydriodic acid. The tincture of iodine and the iodides have been employed with great success in the treatment of goitre and of some scrofulous affections. It must be administered in a very small dose and for a long period. It is said to be apt, however, to induce cholera morbus, signs of great nervous irritability, Iodome'thē, (F.) Ivresse iodique, and emaciation of the mammæ. When these symptoms, collectively termed I'odism, Iodo'sis, and Iodin'ia, (F.) Cachexie iodée, are urgent, the dose may be diminished, or it may be wholly discontinued, and afterwards resumed.

IRIS, (gen. Iridis) Grammē. So called from its resembling the rainbow in a variety of colours. A membrane, stretched vertically at the anterior part of the eye, in the midst of the aqueous humour, in which it forms a kind of circular, flat partition, separating the anterior from the posterior chamber. It is perforated by a circular opening called the pupil, which is constantly varying its dimensions, owing to the varying contractions of the fibres of the iris. Its posterior surface has been called uvea, from the thick, black varnish which covers it. The pigmentary stratum, on its free surface, appears to be bounded by a delicate, but sharply defined, line, which has been described as a special membane—Membra'na pigmen'ti seu lim'itans seu lim'itans Paci'ni seu Jaco'bi Arnold. The greater circumference of the iris is adherent to the ciliary processes and circle. It has an external plane of radiated fibres and an internal one of circular fibres, which serve — the one to dilate, the other to contract the aperture of the pupil. The iris receives the irian nerves. Its arteries are furnished by the long ciliary arteries, which form two circles by their anastomoses; the one very broad, near the great circumference; the other, smaller, and seated around the circumference of the pupil. The veins of the iris empty themselves into the Vaca vorticosa, and into the long ciliary veins. The use of the iris seems to be,—to regulate by its dilatation or contraction, the quantity of luminous rays necessary for distinct vision. The different colours of the iris occasion the variety in the colours of the human eye.

Iris Florenti'na, Florentine iris or orris, (F.) Iris de Florence. Order, Iridaceæ. The rhizoma of this plant is extremely acrid in its recent state; and, when chewed, excites a pungent heat in the mouth, that continues for several hours. When dried, the acrimony is lost, or nearly so, and the smell is very agreeable. It is indebted to its agreeable flavour for its retention in the pharmacopœias, although it is ranked as an expectorant. The orris root of the shops is said to consist of the rhizomes of three species—I. Florentina, I. pallida, and I. Germanica.

Iris Fœtidissima, I. fœ'tida, Spath'ula fœ'tida, Xyris, Stinking iris, (F.) Iris puant, Glayeul puant. The root has been esteemed antispasmodic and narcotic.

Iris German'ica. The systematic name of the Flower-de-Luce, Iris nostras seu vulga'ris, Aier'sa, Common iris or orris, Gladi'olus cæru'leus, (F.) Iris commun, Flambe. The fresh roots have a disagreeable smell, and an acrid, nauseous taste. They are powerfully cathartic, and are given in dropsies, where such remedies are indicated.

It is an errhine, sialogogue, and acrid astringent. The expressed juice is diuretic, and said to be a useful application to serpiginous and other cutaneous affections. Rubbed on the gums, or chewed, it is said to cure toothache.

IRIS PUANT, I. fœtidissima — i. Stinking, I. fœtidissima.

Iris Versic'olor, I. hexago'na, Blue flag. The rhizoma of this is an active cathartic, and has been much used, as such, by the American Indians. It is reputed to be diuretic.

IRISITIS, Iritis.

IRI'TIS, Inflammation of the iris, Inflamma'tio Fridis, Irisi'tis, Iridi'tis, from Iris, and itis, denoting inflammation, Uvei'tis of some. The chief symptoms are;—change in the colour of the iris; fibres less movable; tooth-like processes shooting into the pupil; pupil irregularly contracted, with the ordinary signs of inflammation of the eye. If the inflammation does not yield, suppuration takes place; and although the matter may be absorbed, the iris remains immovable. It is often caused by syphilis. The general principles of treatment are, to deplete largely and exhibit mercury freely; along with attention to other means advisable in ophthalmia. The free use of quinia is sometimes serviceable. When the inflammation is seated in the serous covering of the iris, it is termed Iritis sero'sa.

Broussais defines irritation to be;— the condition of an organ, the excitation of which is carried to so high a degree, that the equilibrium resulting from the balance of all the functions is broken. In this signification, he also uses the word surirritation, which he considered as a higher degree, and as the essential cause of fever. Irritation is the precursor of inflammation.

KIDNEY. Its etymology is uncertain. Serenius derives it fancifully from Su. Goth. qued, the belly; and nigh, (quasi, quidney.) Ren, Nephros, Protme'sis, (Sc.) Neir, Nere, (F.) Rein. The kidneys or reins are the secretory organs of the urine. They are two glands, situate deeply,—the one on the right, and the other on the left side—in the hypochondres: at the sides of the lumbar vertebræ; behind the peritoneum; and in the midst of an abundant, fatty areolar tissue, Tu'nica seu Cap'sula adipo'sa. The kidney is of a reddish-brown colour; oval form; and flattened on two surfaces. It has, at its internal margin, a deep fissure, by which the renal vessels and nerves enter or quit the organ, and the ureter issues. It resembles, pretty accurately, the haricot or kidney-bean. Two substances are readily distinguishable in it;—the outer, secerning, cortical, glandular or vascular, Substan'tia cortica'lis seu glandulo'sa, which secretes the urine; and the inner, tubular, medullary, uriniferous, conoidal or radiated, Substan'tia Medulla'ris seu Tubulo'sa seu Fibro'sa, which appears under the form of small cones or unequal papillæ or mammillæ, each resulting from the union of small capillary tubes, adherent by one of their extremities to the cortical substance; and opening, by the other, at the summit of the cone, into calices, a species of membranous tubes, more or less numerous, which transmit the urine of the papillæ to the pelvis. By the pelvis is meant a small, membranous sac, of an irregularly oval shape, at the base of which are the orifices of the calices, and the other extremity of which is continuous with the ureter. The kidney is surrounded by a fibrous membrane proper to it, Perineph'rus, Tu'nica pro'pria seu albugin'ea. It has been shown by Mr. Bowman and others that the renal artery is distributed to the corpora Malpighiana, forming a pellet of convolutions, which is received into a flask-like dilatation of the ureter—Bowman's Capsule, and through which—it is conceived—the watery portion of the urine is separated. The blood then becomes venous, and is distributed by different veins—portal veins of the kidney—to the convoluted tubes through which the proper urine is secreted. Hence the blood passes into the renal vein. The intermediate vessels between the Malpighian bodies and the convoluted tubes have been termed the Portal System of the Kidney.

KIDNEY, BRIGHT'S DISEASE OF THE, Morbus Bright'ii seu albuminen'sis seu granulo'sus Renum, Nephri'tis albumino'sa seu socia'ta, Nephri'a, Nephrochalazo'sis, Nephrococco'sis, Uroze'mia albumino'sa, Cachec'tic or Asso'ciated nephritis, Inflammation of the Malpig'hian cor'puscles, Disease of Bright, Gran'ular Degenera'tion or Disorganization of the Kidney, Granular Kidney of Bright, Cachec'tic nephri'tis, (F.) Maladie de Bright, Néphrite albumineuse, État Granuleux ou Dégenérescence granulée du Rein, Albuminurorrhée. A granular disease of the cortical part of the kidney, which gives occasion to the secretion of urine that contains albumen, and is of less specific gravity than natural, and which destroys by inducing other diseases. It was first described by Dr. Bright, of London.

A peculiar albuminoid pellicle, which forms on the urine of a pregnant female when allowed to stand for a few days. It is whitish, opalescent, slightly granular, and may be compared to the fatty substance that swims on the surface of soups, after they have been allowed to cool. When taken in conjunction with other phenomena, it is a valuable aid in the diagnosis of early pregnancy.

The London college ascribe it to Pterocar'pus erina'cea; the Edinburgh to Eucalyp'tus resinif'era seu gummif'era, Iron bark; and the Dublin to Butea frondo'sa. The Pharmacopœia of the United States, (1842 and 1851), defines it to be "an extract obtained from an uncertain plant;" that of 1851 states it to be the inspissated juice of Pterocarp'us marsu'pium (De Candolle) and of other plants. On wounding the bark, the kino flows drop by drop. A West India variety is said to be derived from Coccol'oba uvif'era or Sea-side Grape; and a Botany Bay kino is said to be the concrete juice of Eucalyp'tus resinif'era or brown gum-tree of New Holland. Sex. Syst. Icosandria Monogynia. Nat. Ord. Myrtaceæ. Kino consists chiefly of tannic and gallic acids, oxide of iron, and colouring matter. The hands are then changed with the rollers, crossing them so as to form a knot, and taking one above the head; the other beneath the chin. They are then crossed again, so as to form several knots, one above the other. This bandage is called, by some surgeons, solar or oblique chevestre or capistrum.

KYESTINIC, Kiestinic.

KYLLOPODIA, Kyllosis

KYLLO'SIS, from κυλλος, 'crooked,' 'lame.' Cyllo'sis, Kyllopod'ia. Professor Chaussier so calls congenital distortion of the feet, Clubfoot, Poltfoot, Stumpfoot, (Prov.) Pummel-foot, Tal'ipes, (F.) Pied bot. Of this there are many varieties. In one, the foot, instead of resting on the soil, by the whole plantar surface, touches it only with the metatarso-phalangian articulations. It seems as if turned backwards and broken upon the leg, (Pes seu Tal'ipes Equi'nus, Hip'opus, Oxypod'ia, Tip-foot, Horsefoot.) In other cases the foot is twisted inwards, (Varus, Tal'ipes varus, Blæsop'odes, Blæ'sopus, Cylloepus, Cyllop'oda, Cyllopod'ion, Lo'ripes, Crossfoot, (F.) Cagneux,) so that it rests only on the ground on its outer edge; or it may be twisted outwards, (Valgus, Tal'ipes Valgus, Out-bow-foot,) or rest only on its inner edge, or on the back part of the heel, Talipes calca'neus, Heel clubfoot. In the flatfoot or splayfoot, Duck-foot, Splat-foot, Sar'apus, Plat'ypus, Platypod'ia, (F.) Pied plat, the plantar surface of the foot is flattened instead of being concave.

These deformities are rarely accidental. They are almost always congenital, and may be rectified, at an early period, by proper mechanical means to strengthen the foot gradually and restore it to its proper shape and direction; and if these means fail, the tendons and muscles concerned in the deformity may be divided.

KYMOGRAPH'ION, Cymograph'ion; from κυμα, 'wave,' and γραφω, 'I describe.' A wave describer or measurer.' An instrument invented by Ludwig, which is self-registering, and exhibits the relation between the waves of the pulse and the undulations produced by respiration.

KYST, Cyst, Kystis, Cystis, from κυστις, 'a bladder,' 'pouch.' (F.) Kyste. This term is generally applied to a pouch or sac,—Cysto'ma,—without opening, and commonly of a membranous nature, which is accidentally developed in one of the natural cavities, or in the substance of organs. Many theories have been successively emitted to explain the formation of cysts, but none are entirely satisfactory. Some are formed by a thin, translucent membrane, having scarcely the thickness of the arachnoid; others of a whitish, fibrocellular membrane, more or less thick. Some contain cartilaginous or bony flakes. The greater part have but one cavity; others, on the contrary, have several, separated by complete or imperfect septa, as is frequently seen in those developed in the ovaries. The matter contained in cysts is sometimes limpid, serous, yellowish white, reddish, and, at others, more or less thick, albuminous, adipous, or caseous. The tumour, formed by them, is called Encysted.

LABIAL ARTERY. Haller and Sabatier call thus the facial artery of the majority of anatomists. The labial arteries, properly so called, coronary arteries of the lips, (F.) Coronaires des lèvres, are two in number. The superior arises from the facial, above, and very close to, the commissure of the lips. It is large and tortuous, and is distributed to the upper lip. The lower arises from the facial, at a considerable distance from the commissure, and proceeds, in a serpentine course, into the substance of the lower lip, to which it is distributed.

LABIAL GLANDS. This name is given to a multitude of muciparous follicles, of some size, round, prominent, and separate from each other, which are found on the inner surface of the lips, below the mucous membrane.

LAB'YRINTH, Labyrinth'us, Antrum buccino'sum. A place, full of turnings, the exit of which is not easily discoverable. Anatomists have given this name to the aggregate of parts, constituting the internal ear, Labyrinth'us auris in'timæ, In'tima pars or'gani audi'tûs, Labyrinth'ic cavity of the ear. The Labyrinth is situate between the tympanum and meatus auditorius internus. It is composed of several cavities, which communicate with each other in the dried bone; as the vestibule, cochlea, semicircular canals, &c. It is lined by periosteum, and also by a pulpy membrane, constituting the membranous labyrinth, on which the auditory nerve is regularly dispersed. This membranc forms two sacks in the vestibule, called sac'culus vestib'uli and sac'culus, respectively, which resemble in shape that of the bony cavities containing them. Each sac contains calcareous matter, constituting the Otoliths and Otoconies. When the sac is laid open, upon the upper and outer part, a partition appears, partaking of the nature of the sac, and called by Meckel, Septum vestib'uli nervo'smembrana'ceum.

Labyrinth is also applied to the lateral portions of the ethmoid bone, which are formed of large irregular cells.

Lac is a substance formed by an insect, and deposited on different species of trees, chiefly in the East Indies, for example, on Croton laccif'erum, and two species of Ficus,—Ficus religio'sa, and F. In'dica. The various kinds, distinguished in commcrce, are stick-lac, which is the substance in its natural state, investing the small twigs of the tree; and seed-lac, which is the same broken off. LACHRYMAL ARTERY proceeds from the ophthalmic; and distributes its principal branches to the lachrymal gland.

LACHRYMAL CANAL or DUCT, Nasal Canal or duct, Cana'lis lacryma'lis seu or'bitæ nasa'lis seu Sacci lacryma'lis, Ductus ad Nasum seu Nasa'lis orbitæ, is formed by the superior maxillary bone, os unguis, and os turbinatum inferius; and is seated in the outer paries of the nasal fossæ. It is lined by a prolongation of the mucous membrane of the lachrymal sac; and its inferior orifice is furnished with a valvular duplicature. This duct transmits the tears, which have been absorbed at the great angle of the eye by the puncta lacrymalia, into the nasal fossæ.

LACHRYMAL CARUNCLE, see Caruncula lacrymalis.

LACHRYMAL DUCT, Lachrymal Canal.

LACHRYMAL FOSSA, Fossa seu Fo'vea lacryma'lis, is a slight depression at the upper part of the orbit, which lodges the lachrymal gland.

LACHRYMAL GLAND, Glan'dula lacryma'lis seu innomina'ta Gale'ni, is seated in a depression of the frontal bone at the upper, anterior, and outer part of the orbit. It is of about the size of an almond; and of an oval shape, flattened above and below:—its great diameter being the anteroposterior. It is composed of several small lobules, united by areolar tissue, and separated by it as well as by vessels and nerves which creep in the intervals, This gland has seven or eight excretory ducts, which open behind the upper eyelid. Its use is to secrete the tears, and pour them on the globe of the eye by the excretory ducts.

LACHRYMAL GROOVE, (F.) Gouttière lacrymale, is the bony channel, which lodges the lachrymal sac. It is seated at the anterior and inner part of the orbit, and is formed by the os unguis and the ascending process of the upper jaw bone.

LACHRYMAL HERNIA, Lachrymal Tumour, Her'nia Sacci Lacryma'lis, is when the tears enter the puncta, but cannot pass to the nose, and accumulate. By Anel, this was called Dropsy of the Lacrymal sac.

LACHRYMAL NERVE is the smallest of the three branches formed by the ophthalmic nerve. It is distributed, particularly, to the lachrymal gland and to the upper eyelid. In its course it gives off a spheno-maxillary and a malar filament.

LACHRYMAL PAPILLA, see Lachrymal Puncta.

LACHRYMAL PASSAGES, Viæ lacryma'les, (F.) Voies lacrymales. The organs concerned in the secretion of tears, in spreading them over the eye, and taking them up again to transmit them into the nasal fossæ. The lachrymal passages are composed of the lachrymal gland, caruncle, puncta, ducts, lachrymal sac, and nasal duct, which, together, form the lachrymal appara'tus, (F.) Appareil lacrymal.

LACHRYMAL PUNCTA, Puncta Lacryma'lia, Spiram'ina Palpebra'rum, (F.) Points lacrymaux, are two small, round, and contractile openings, situate in the centre of a tubercle or papilla, Papilla lacryma'lis, Tuber'culum lacryma'lē, about a line and a half distant from the inner commissure of the eyelids, and continuous with the lachrymal ducts. These ducts, Lacryma'les Canalic'uli, Cana'les seu Ductus lacryma'les, Ductus lacrymales latera'les seu puncto'rum lacryma'lium, Cor'nua lacryma'lia seu lima'cum, Collic'iæ puncto'rum lacryma'lium, Canalic'uli lima'cum, (F.) Conduits lacrymaux, are two in number—a superior and an inferior—which extend from the puncta to the lachrymal sac. They seem formed by a very delicate prolongation of the conjunctiva, which is continuous with the mucous membrane of the lachrymal sac, (F.) Reservoir des larmes:—the Saccus seu Sinus seu Lacus lacryma'lis, Dacryocys'tis, Infundib'ulum lacryma'lē.

By some anatomists, the lamina is divided into a Zona os'sea and Z. mollis. By others, it is considered to consist of four laminæ, when examined with a strong glass: a Zona os'sea, next to the modiolus — a Zona coria'cea, on the outer side of this: a Zona vesicula'ris — and a Zona membrana'cea, which is, perhaps, the lining membrane of the cochlea. The blade is formed of well-polished steel. Lancets are made of different shapes; some being broad-shouldered — others, spear-pointed. The French distinguished three kinds: 1. Lancette à grain d'orge, which, on account of the almost oval shape of its point, makes a large opening. 2. LAND'S END, CLIMATE OF. The climate of the Land's End, in England, resembles that of the south of Devonshire, but is more relaxing. It is considered to be most likely to prove beneficial in consumptive cases, in which the disease is accompanied by an irritated state of the pulmonary mucous membrane, producing a dry cough. Where the system is relaxed, and the secretion from the lungs considerable, the climate, it is conceived, will generally prove injurious. As a brumal retreat, the southern coast of Devonshire would seem to be preferable to it.

LARYNGEAL ARTERIES are given off from the thyroid arteries.

LARYNGEAL NERVES, (F.) Nerfs Laryngés, are two in number;—a superior and an inferior. The superior laryngeal nerve is given off from the trunk of the pneumogastric, at the upper and deep part of the neck. It passes downwards and inwards, behind the internal carotid artery, and divides into two secondary branches; the one, external, which distributes its filaments, on the outside of the larynx, to the sterno-thyroid, hyo-thyroid, constrictor inferior, crico-thyroid muscles, &c. The other, the internal, which crosses the thyro-hyoid membrane, and gives filaments to the epiglottis, the mucous membranes of the pharynx and larynx, to the arytenoid gland, the arytenoid and crico-thyroid muscles, and ultimately anastomoses with the inferior laryngeal nerve. The inferior laryngeal nerves or recur'rents, Nervi reversi'vi, Rameaux Trachéaux (Chaus.,) arise from the trunk of the pneumogastric within the thorax. They ascend in the furrow, which separates the trachea from the œsophagus, to be distributed on the neck, after having been reflected;—the left around the arch of the aorta; the right, around the corresponding subclavian. They send off filaments to the cardiac plexuses; to the parietes of the œsophagus, and trachea; to the thyroid gland; to the inferior constrictor of the pharynx; the posterior and lateral crico-arytenoid and thyro-arytenoid muscles; and to the mucous membrane of the pharynx and larynx.

LARYNGEAL PHTHISIS, Phthisis, laryngeal.

Laryngeal Pouches. Small culs-de-sac, which lead from the anterior part of each ventricle of the larynx upwards, for the space of half an inch, between the superior ligaments on the inner side, and the thyroid cartilage on the outer, reaching as high as the upper border of that cartilage at the sides of the epiglottis. Numerous small glands open into them.

This disease, in some measure, resembles croup; but is usually devoid of that peculiar sonorous inspiration, which attends the latter. There is, also, pain upon pressing the larynx; and, whilst laryngitis is a disease of more advanced life, croup attacks children. The membraniform exudation is, also, absent; probably, because the inflammation, being seated above the glottis, the coagulable lymph is readily expectorated. It requires the most active treatment.

Simple Laryngitis is called by some mucous Laryngitis, Laryngitis acu'ta seu muco'sa acuta, (F.) Laryngite muqueuse, to distinguish it from submucous Laryngitis or Œdema of the glottis.

Chronic Laryngitis is generally regarded as synonymous with laryngeal phthisis; but it may exist independently.

A similar physical sign exists when there is a cavity in the lungs, and the instrument is placed over it whilst the patient speaks. See Pectoriloquy.

Bentley, Laurence, Geoffroi, &c., regard it to have been the same as asafœtida: — Theophrastus, Dioscorides, and the ancient scholiast of Aristophanes, however, by assigning a sweet and agreeable flavour to the laserpitium, discountenance the idea. From whatever plant obtained, it was so rare, and consequently so costly, that the Romans deposited it in the public treasury. It was obtained from Cyrene—Succus Cyrena'icus—and likewise from Persia — the latter being the most valuable. The Laserpitium is called by Avicenna, Althit.

It is attached to the posterior half of the outer lip of the crest of the ilium; to the posterior surface of the sacrum; to the spinous processes of the six or seven last dorsal vertebræ, to all those of the loins, and to the last four false ribs, and is inserted by a strong tendon at the posterior edge of the bicipital groove of the humerus. Its upper fibres are almost horizontal; the middle very long and oblique upwards and outwards; and the anterior almost vertical. This muscle carries the arm backwards, depressing it, and making it turn on its axis. It also draws backwards and downwards the prominence of the shoulder. When suspended by an arm, we make an effort to raise ourselves, it draws the trunk towards the arm. It can, also, raise the ribs by assuming its fixed point on the humerus, and become an inspiratory muscle.

To the Leprosy of the Jews, Leucē, Lepido'sis Lepriasis canes'cens, Lepra Mosa'ica seu Hebræo'rum, — a variety of the Alphos or Lepra alphoï'des. The leuce was, generally, not scaly, but consisted of smooth, shining patches, on which the hair turned white and silky, and the skin, with the muscular flesh, lost its sensibility. It was incurable. 2. To the Elephantiasis or Lepra of the Arabs, see Elephantiasis; and 3. To the Lepra of the Greeks, which includes all the varieties met with at the present day. It is characterized by scaly patches of different sizes, but having always nearly a circular form. Bateman and Willan describe three chief varieties of this lepra.

1. Lepra alphoï'des, Lepido'sis Lepri'asis alb'ida, Alphos, Morphœ'a alba, Vitili'go alphus, Al'baras alba, Albaræa, Albaros, Lèpre écailleuse of Alibert, White leprosy. An affection, characterized by white patches, surrounded by a rose-coloured areola, which appears here and there on the surface; depressed in the middle.

3. Lepra vulga'ris, Lepido'sis lepri'asis vulga'ris, Dartre furfuracée arrondie, of Alibert, characterized as follows: scales glabrous, whitish, size of a crown piece; preceded by smaller reddish and glossy elevations of the skin, encircled by a dry, red, and slightly elevated border; often confluent; sometimes covering the whole of the body except the face.

Lepra appears to be endemic in Egypt, in Java, and certain parts of Norway and Sweden. Imperfect and faulty nutriment appears to contribute to its development. The means, best adapted for its removal, are:—a mild, unirritating diet, emollient fomentations—sulphureous baths, fumigations, &c; but, often, all remedial agents will be found ineffectual.

Leucoma* and Albugo are often used synonymously to denote a white opacity of the cornea. Both are essentially different from nebula of the cornea; nebula being usually the result of chronic ophthalmy and an effusion of a milky serum into the texture of the delicate continuation of the conjunctiva over the cornea; — the others are the result of violent, acute ophthalmia. In this state, a thick, coagulable lymph is extravasated from the arteries, sometimes superficially, at other times deeply into the substance of the cornea. On other occasions, the disease consists of a firm, callous cicatrix on this membrane,—the effect of a wound or ulcer with loss of substance. The affection is more difficult of cure in proportion to its duration and to the age of the individual; the activity of the absorbents being greater in youth. If inflammation still exist, antiphlogistics must be persevered in, and, afterwards, gentle stimulants be used to excite absorption; along with the internal use of mercury or iodine.

Attention to the general health, change of air, keeping up a perspirable state of the surface by flannel worn next the skin, the horizontal posture, &c., do more than pharmaceutical agents; which are almost entirely confined to astringent injections. LEVAIN, Ferment.

LEVATOR, Elevator.

Leva'tor An'guli Oris, Abdu'cens labio'rum, Eleva'tor labiorum commu'nis, Cani'nus, (F.) Sus maxillo-labial, Petit sus-maxillo-labial (Ch.), Muscle canin. A small, flat, long, quadrilateral muscle, which arises from the fossa canina, and is inserted at the commissure of the lips, where it is confounded with the triangularis. It raises the corner of the mouth, and draws it towards the ear.

Levator Ani, Levator magnus seu internus, Latus ani, Eleva'tor ani, Sedem attol'lens, (F.) Pubio-coccygien annulaire, Sous pubio-coccygien (Ch.), Releveur de l'anus. A muscle, situate at the lower part of the pelvis. It is broad, flat, quadrilateral, and broader above than below. It represents a kind of membranous partition, which closes the outlet of the pelvis, and the upper concavity of which is opposed to that of the diaphragm. It is attached, above, to the posterior surface of the body of the pubis, to the upper part of the obdurator foramen, and to the spine of the ischium; and is inserted into the coccyx, into an aponeurotic line common to it and its fellow, and into the lateral parts of the rectum. This muscle supports the rectum; raises it, and carries it upwards during the evacuation of the excrement. It can, also, compress the bladder and vesiculæ seminales, and thus favour the expulsion of the urine and sperm.

Levator Glan'dulæ Thyroïdeæ. A muscle occasionally found connected with the upper border or isthmus of the thyroid gland; and attached superiorly to the body of the os hyoides, or to the thyroid cartilage.

Levator Labii Inferio'ris, L. menti, Elevator labii inferio'ris seu labii inferioris pro'prius, Incisi'vus infe'rior, Mus'culus penicillo'tus.(F.) Houppe du menton, Releveur de la lèvre inférieur ou du menton. A portion of the mento-labial of Chaussier. A small muscle situate before the symphysis menti. It is thick, conical; and attached by its apex to a fossette at the side of the symphysis in the inferior maxillary bone. Its fibres proceed diverging and vanishing in the manner of a tuft, (F.) Houppe, on the skin of the chin. This muscle raises the chin, and pushes upwards the lower lip.

Levator Labii Superio'ris Alæque Nasi. Incisi'vus latera'lis et pyramida'lis, (F.) Grand sus-maxillo-labial (Ch.), Élévateur commun de l'aile du nez et de la lèvre supérieure. This muscle is a fleshy, thin, triangular bundle, situate at the sides of the nose. It arises from the ascending process of the superior maxillary bone: thence its fibres descend in a diverging manner, a part being inserted into the ala of the nose, and a part losing themselves in the upper lip. This muscle raises the upper lip and ala nasi, which it draws a little outwards.

Levator Labii Superioris Proprius, Mus'culus incisi'vus, Elevator labii superioris proprius, (F.) Moyen sus-maxillo-labial. (Ch.), Orbito-maxillo-labial. This thin, flat, quadrilateral muscle is situate at the middle and inner part of the face. It arises from the os malæ and the os maxillare superius, and is inserted into the upper lip, which it raises, at the same time carrying it a little outwards.

Levator Pala'ti, L. Palati Mollis, Petrosalpin'go-staphyli'nus, Salpin'go-staphyli'nus inter'nus, Salpingo-staphylinus, Pter'ygo-staphylinus externus, Spheno-staphylinus, Spheno-palati'nus, Peristaphylinus internus superior, Pétro-staphylin, (Ch.). This muscle is long, narrow, and almost round above; broader and flatter inferiorly. It arises from the lower surface of the pars petrosa; from the cartilage of the Eustachian-tube; and is inserted into the substance of the velum palati. Its use is to raise the velum palati.

Levator Pal'pebræ Superio'ris, Palpebræ superioris primus, Apertor Oculi, Ape'riens Palpebra'rum rectus, Reclu'sor palpebra'rum, (F.) Orbito-palpébral (Ch.), Orbito-sus-palpébral, Élévateur de la paupière supérieure. A long, small, thin muscle, situate at the upper part of the orbitar cavity. By its posterior extremity it is inserted into the little ala of the sphenoid bone, immediately in front of the foramen opticum, and, by its anterior extremity, which is expanded, it terminates at the upper margin of the tarsal cartilage of the eyelid. This muscle raises the upper eyelid, draws it backwards, and sinks it into the orbit.

Levator Pros'tatæ, (F.) Releveur de la prostate. Santorini has given this name to the anterior fibres of the levator ani, which embrace the prostate.

Levator Scap'ulæ, Eleva'tor scapulæ, E. seu Mus'culus Patien'tiæ, Angula'ris, Levator pro'prius scapulæ,—(F.) Trachélo-scapulaire (Ch.), Angulaire de l'omoplate, Releveur de l'omoplate.

This muscle is so called, because it is attached to the upper and internal angle of the scapula. It is situate at the posterior and lateral part of the neck, and at the upper part of the back. It is long, flat, and broader above than below. In this latter direction, it is inserted into the superior internal angle of the scapula; and, in the former, into the tops of the transverse processes of the first four cervical vertebræ. It depresses the prominence of the shoulder, by raising the posterior angle of the scapula, on which it impresses a kind of rotary motion. It can, also, draw the head to one side.

LEVATOR URE'THRÆ, (F.) Releveur de l'Urèthre. Santorini describes under this name a portion of the transversus perinæi muscle.

LEVATORES COSTARUM, Supracostales.

LEVEN, Ferment.

LEVER, from levare, 'to lift up.' Vectis, Mochlus, Porrec'tum. An inflexible rod, turning round a fixed point, and used for moving bodies, bearing burdens, or raising them. The point on which the lever moves is called the Fulcrum, Hypomoch'lion. The force which moves the lever is called the power; and the weight to be moved, the resistance. There are three kinds of levers. A lever of the first kind has the fulcrum between the power and resistance. A lever of the second kind has the resistance between the fulcrum and power; whilst a lever of the third kind has the power between the fulcrum and resistance. In the locomotive system of the human body, we have examples of all the three kinds. The bones represent levers; the muscles of locomotion are powers; the weight of parts to be moved constitutes the resistance. The fulcra, are, at times, the joints; at others, the ground, &c. The head moves on the neck, as a lever of the first kind; the first cervical vertebra forming the fulcrum. We rise on tiptoe by a lever of the second kind, the fulcrum being the ground under the toes; and we have examples of a lever of the third kind in the flexion of the fore-arm on the arm, in the elevation of the arm, &c.

LEVER, Hystero-moch'lium, Mochlis'cus, Vectis obstetric' ius, Vectis, (F.) Levier, is an instrument curved at the extremity, and having a fenestra. It is used to assist the extraction of the child's head, when instrumental aid is necessary. Levers are, also, used by the dentist for extracting stumps, &c. The Levier de l'Écluse, Langue de Carpe, Trivelin or Punch, is employed for extracting the molar teeth.

LEVI'ATHAN PENIS, Pria'pus Ceti, Bale'nus. The penis of the whale. This singular medicine was, at one time, given in powder, in cases of dysentery and leucorrhœa.

LEVIER, Lever—l. de l'Écluse, see Lever.

LEVIGA'TION, Lævigat'io, from lævigare, lævigat'um, (lævis, 'smooth,') 'to polish.' Porphyriza'tion. An operation, by which bodies are reduced to very fine powder. It is performed by putting substances, already pulverized, into water; the coarser parts are not long in being deposited, whilst the finer molecules remain suspended in the water. The liquor is decanted into another vessel, and suffered to remain at rest, until the fine particles are collected at the bottom. The fluid part is then separated by decantation.

LICHE. Body.

LICHEN, λειχην or λιχην, (pronounced li'ken,) Exor'mia Lichen, Leichen, Serpi'go, Volat'ica, Pap'ulæ, P. siccæ, Peti'go, Pustulæ siccæ, Scabies sicca seu a'gria, Lichen'asis adulto'rum, Li'chenous rash, (F.) Gale sèche, Dartre furfuracée volante, Poussée. The cutaneous affection described under this name by the Greek writers, is not clearly defined. Some have believed it to be Impetigo, but this is doubtful. The name is, now, generally applied to a diffuse eruption of red pimples, accompanied by a troublesome sense of tingling or pricking. Drs. Willan and Bateman define it,—"an extensive eruption of papulæ affecting adults, connected with internal disorder, usually terminating in scurf; recurrent, not contagious." One of their varieties, however, the Lichen Tropicus, does not accord well with this definition; for it affects children as well as adults, and is unconnected with internal disorder.

LICHEN A'GRIUS, L. A'gria, Exor'mia Lichen ferus, Lichen ferus, Pap'ula a'gria, Wild Lichen, is distinguished by pimples in clusters or patches, surrounded by a red halo; the cuticle growing gradually harsh, thickened, and chappy, often preceded by general irritation. In addition to antiphlogistics, a cooling ointment may be used, to allay itching.

LICHEN BARBATUS PLICATUS, L. plicatus.

LICHEN CIRCUMSCRIP'TUS is characterized by clusters or patches of papulæ, having a well defined margin, and an irregularly circular form: continuing for six or eight weeks. These varieties require but little medical treatment. The antiphlogistic plan is all that is necessary.

LICHEN FERUS, Lichen agrius.

LICHEN LIV'IDUS. The papulæ have a dark red or livid hue, without any fever. They are more permanent in this variety. It requires the mineral acids and bark.

Lichen Pila'ris, Exor'mia Lichen pilaris, is merely a modification of the preceding; the papulæ appearing at the roots of the hair.

Lichen Simplex, Exor'mia Lichen simplex, consists of an eruption of red papulæ, appearing first on the face or arms, and afterwards extending over the body; preceded for a few days by slight febrile irritation, which usually ceases when the eruption appears,—with an unpleasant sense of tingling during the night. It generally dies away in ten days or a fortnight.

Lichen Trop'icus, Exormia Lichen tropicus, Eczes'ma, Es'sera [?], Sudam'ina [?], Prickly Heat, Summer Rash. The pimples are bright red, and of the size of a small pin's head; with heat, itching, and pricking, as if by needles. It is local; produced by excessive heat; and disappears when the weather becomes cooler, or the individual is inured to the climate.

Lichen Urica'tus, L. Urtico'sus, Exor'mia Lichen urtico'sus, is another variety. The Nettle Lichen consists of papulæ, accompanied by wheals like those of nettle rash. A variety of this is said to be called, in America, blights.

Lichen, Wild, Lichen agrius.

Lichen Aphthosus, Pelti'dea aphtho'sa; Ord. Lichenaceæ; is said to be cathartic and anthelmintic.

This cryptogamous plant was, for a long time, considered capable of preventing and curing Rabies canina. It has, also, been used in mania and in spasmodic asthma.

This plant is inodorous, with a bitter and mucilaginous taste. It is esteemed to be tonic, demulcent, and nutrient. Dose, ʒj to ʒiv, being first steeped in water holding in solution some carbonate of potassa to extract the bitter, and then boiled in milk. A bitter principle has been extracted from it, termed Cetrarin, Cetrari'num, Cetra'rium, which has been given in intermittents.

LIFE, Sax. lif, lyf, Vita, Bios, Bi'otē, Bi'otos, Zoē, Pneuma, Spir'itus, (F.) Vie. The state of organized beings, during which, owing to the union of an unknown force with matter, they are capable of performing functions different from those that regulate other natural bodies; all of which functions, however numerous and diversified, work to one end. Life has only a limited duration; beyond which,—the organic functions ceasing to be executed,—the body is given up to the agency of chemical affinity. Hence Bichat has defined life to be—the aggregate of the functions which resist death. On account of the difference that exists among the vital functions, he applied the term Organic Life to the functions inservient to composition and decomposition;—as digestion, respiration, circulation, calorification, absorption, secretion, and nutrition; and Animal Life, to the functions which connect man and animals with external bodies; as the understanding, sensations, locomotion and voice.

LIGATURA, Ligature, Fascia — l. Glandis, Phimosis.

LIG'ATURE, Ligatu'ra, Liga'tio, Alligatu'ra, Deliga'tio, Vinctu'ra, Fascia, Epid'esis. This word has various acceptations. It means, 1. The thread with which an artery or vein is tied, to prevent or arrest hemorrhage. 2. The cord, or thread, or wire, used for removing tumours, &c. 3. The bandage used for phlebotomy. Ligature is, also, sometimes applied to the act of tying an artery or considerable vessel—Liga'tion, and occasionally we meet with the terms to ligature and to ligate, used unnecessarily in this sense, in place of to take up or tie a vessel. When the artery alone is tied, the ligature is said to be immediate; when any of the surrounding parts are included, it is said to be mediate. The ligature occasions obliteration or adhesion of the arterial parietes, by cutting through the middle and internal coats; the adhesion being favoured by the formation of a coagulum, which acts, in some degree, as a barrier against the impulse of the blood, and subsequently disappears by absorption.

LIGHT, Sax. leoht, liht, (G.) Licht, Lux Lumen, Phos, (F.) Lumière. An extremely rare fluid; diffused over the universe; emanating from the sun and fixed stars; traversing more than four millions of leagues in a minute; passing through transparent bodies, which refract it according to their density and combustibility; and arrested by opake bodies, by which it is reflected at an angle equal to the angle of incidence. It is the cause of colour in all bodies, being entirely reflected by white surfaces and absorbed by black. It is decomposed in passing through a transparent prism into seven rays—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, purple, and violet.

Light acts upon the body as a gentle and salutary stimulus. It urges to exercise, whilst privation of it induces sleep and inactivity, and disposes to obesity. Hence it is, that, in rural economy, animals which are undergoing the process of fattening are kept in obscurity. When vegetables are deprived of light, their nutrition is interfered with, and they become etiolated. To a certain extent this applies to animals, and there is every reason to believe, that want of light prevents the due development of organized bodies. It has been found that, when tadpoles were deprived of light, they did not undergo the perfect metamorphosis into the frog, but that monstrosities from arrest of development were induced.

LIN'GUAL, Lingua'lis, from lingua, 'the tongue.' Relating or belonging to the tongue.

LINGUAL AR'TERY, Arte'ria lingua'lis, arises from the external carotid; and, after several tortuosities, reaches the base of the tongue, becomes horizontal, and, under the name Ranine, advances to the tip, where it anastomoses with its fellow. In its course, it gives off the Dorsalis linguæ and sublingual.

Lingual Muscle, Lingua'lis, Basio-glossus (Cowper), Glossia'nus, is a small, long, fasciculus of fibres, hidden beneath the sides of the tongue, between the hyoglossus and styloglossus muscles, which are on the outside, and the genioglossus, within. This muscle passes from the base to the tip of the tongue; and, at its sides, is confounded with the muscles just referred to. It shortens the tongue, depresses its point, and can carry it to the right or left side.

Lingual Nerve is a name which has been given to the ninth pair or hypoglossus. It is, also, a term applied to a branch given off from the Inferior maxillary, or third branch of the fifth pair. Near its origin it anastomoses with, or simply runs close to, the chorda tympani. It afterwards gives off a considerable number of filaments, which are distributed to the tongue, and some of which are said to have been even traced as far as the papillæ; — a distribution which has occasioned it to be regarded as the Gus'tatory nerve, (F.) Nerf gustatif.

Lingual Salivary Glands, see Salivary glands.

Lingual Vein follows nearly the same distribution as the artery. It opens into the internal jugular.

Lip, Sax. and Germ. Lippe, Cheilos, La'bium, Labrum, (F.) Lèvre. [In Entomology, labium means the lower lip,—labrum, the upper.] The lips are composed of different muscular fasciculi, nerves, and vessels, covered by the skin and mucous membrane of the mouth. They circumscribe the anterior aperture of that cavity; and are inservient to mastication, pronunciation, &c. They are distinguished into upper and lower—Anochei'lon; and Catochei'lon, (Prov.) Fipple—and are placed in front of each jaw, forming between them the anterior aperture of the mouth. They unite at each side, and form what are called the angles or commissures of the mouth—Chal'ini. Their free edge is covered with a mucous membrane, of a more or less livid red, according to the individual. They receive their arteries from the external carotid. Their veins open into the two jugulars. Their lymphatic vessels descend into the ganglions situate beneath the chin. Their nerves are derived from the infra-orbitar, mental, and facial.

Lips, La'bia, (F.) Lèvres de la vulve, are folds belonging to the genital organs of the female, and distinguished into — 1. Labia pudenʼdi seu Cunni seu majoʼra, Episiʼa, Alæ pudenʼdi mulieʼbris, Hytrocheʼlides, Rupes, Alæ majoʼres, Crenʼnoi, (F.) Grandes Lèvres. These are two membranous folds, thicker above than below, which limit the vulva laterally, and extend from the inferior part of the mons veneris to the perinæum. They unite anteriorly and posteriorly, forming commissures; the posterior of which is called Fourchette. Their outer surface is convex; formed of skin and covered with hair. The inner surface is white, and covered by a mucous membrane, continuous with that lining the other parts of the vulva. The space between the skin and mucous membrane is filled with a fatty tissue and fibrous bands, some fibres of the constrictor vaginæ muscle, vessels, and nerves.

We speak, also, of the lips of a wound, ulcer, &c., when alluding to the edges of these solutions of continuity.

LITHOTERE'THRUM, from λιθος, 'stone,' and τερειν, 'to rub.' A lithotritor.

LITHOTHLIBIE (F.), from λιθος, 'stone,' and θλιβω, 'I crush.' The crushing of a friable calculus between a finger, passed by the rectum or vagina as far as the bas-fond of the bladder, and a catheter introduced into the bladder.

LITHOTHRYPSIS, Lithotrity.

LITHOTHRYPTORS, see Lithotrity.

LITHOTOME, Lithot'omus, from λιθος, 'a stone,' τεμνω, 'I cut,' and τομη, 'an incision.' This name has been given to a number of instruments of different shapes and sizes, which are used in the operation for the stone, to cut the neck or body of the bladder. They ought, with more propriety, to be called Cystotomes.

The Lithotome Caché of Frère Côme is the most known, and is still occasionally used. It is composed of a handle, and a flattened sheath, slightly curved: in this there is a cutting blade, which can be forced out, by pressing upon a bascule or lever, to any extent that may be wished by the operator.

A Double Lithotome was used by Dupuytren in his bilateral operation. See Lithotomy.

LITHOT'OMIST. Same etymon. Lithot'omus. One who devotes himself entirely to operating for the stone. One who practises lithotomy.

LITHOT'OMY, Lithotom'ia, Cystotom'ia, Urolithotom'ia, Sectio vesica'lis, Lithocystot'omy. Same etymon. (F.) Taille. The operation by which a stone is extracted from the bladder. The different methods, according to which this operation may be practised, are reducible to five principal; each of which has experienced numerous modifications.

1. The Method of Celsus, Meth'odus Celsia'na, Cystotom'ia cum appara'tu parvo, Appara'tus Minor, Cutting on the Gripe. This consisted in cutting upon the stone, after having made it project at the perinæum by means of the fingers introduced into the rectum. This method was attended with several inconveniences; such as the difficulty of dividing the parts neatly, injury done to the bladder, as well as the impossibility of drawing down the stone in many persons. It is sometimes, also, called Meth'odus Guytonia'na; from Guy de Chauliac having endeavoured to remove from it the discredit into which it had fallen in his time. It was termed Apparatus Minor, (F.) Le petit appareil, from the small number of instruments required in it.

2. Apparatus Major. This method was invented, in 1520, by John de Romani, a surgeon of Cremona, and communicated by him to Mariano-Santo-di-Barletta, whence it was long called Mariano's Method, Sec'tio Maria'na. It was called, also, Apparatus Major, and Cystotom'ia seu Meth'odus cum appara'tu magno, (F.) Le grand appareil, from the number of instruments required in it. An incision was made on the median line; but the neck of the bladder was not comprehended in it. It was merely dilated. The greater apparatus was liable to many inconveniences, such as ecchymoses; contusion; inflammation of the neck of the bladder; abscesses; urinary fistulæ; incontinence of urine; impotence, &c.

3. The High Operation, Apparatus altus, Cystotom'ia cum apparatu alto, C. Hypogas'trica, Epicystotom'ia, Laparocystotom'ia, Sectio seu Meth'odus Franconia'na, S. Hypogas'trica seu alta, (F.) Haut appareil, Taille Hypogastrique, Taille sus-pubienne, was first practised by Peter Franco, about the middle of the 16th century. It consisted in pushing the stone above the pubis by the fingers introduced into the rectum. Rousset afterwards proposed to make the bladder rise above the pubis by injecting it. The method had fallen into discredit, when Frère Côme revived it. It is used when the calculus is very large. It was practised by opening first the membranous part of the urethra upon the catheter passed into the canal. Through this incision, the Sonde à dard — a species of catheter, having a spear-pointed stilet — was introduced into the bladder. An incision was then made into the linea alba, above the symphysis pubis, of about four or five fingers' breadth, and the peritoneum detached to avoid wounding it. The stilet was pushed through the bladder, and used as a director for the knife, with which the bladder was divided anteriorly, as far as the neck; and the stone extracted. It was performed in England by Douglass, in 1719, and since by others, with various modifications.

4. The Lat'eral Operation, Hypocysteotom'ia, Cystotom'ia latera'lis, Cystauchenotom'ia, Cystotrachelotom'ia, Urethrocystauchenotom'ia, Urethrocysteotrachelotom'ia, Sec'tio latera'lis, Appara'tus latera'lis, (F.) Appareil latéralisé, so named from the prostate gland and neck of the bladder being cut laterally, was probably invented by Peter Franco. It was introduced into France by Frère Jacques de Beaulieu. He performed it with rude instruments, invented by himself, and improved by the suggestions of some of the Parisian surgeons. In England, it received its earliest and most important improvements from the celebrated Cheselden. It is the method practised at the present day, according to different modes of procedure. In this method, the patient is placed upon a table; his legs and thighs are bent and separated; the hands being tied to the feet. The perinæum is then shaved, and a staff is introduced into the bladder; the handle being turned towards the right groin of the patient. An oblique incision is now made from the raphe to the middle of a line drawn from the anus to the tuberosity of the ischium of the left side; and, taking the staff for a guide, the integuments, areolar tissue of the perinæum, membranous portion of the urethra, transversus perinæi muscle, bulbo-cavernosus, some fibres of the levator ani, the prostate and neck of the bladder, are successively divided. For this latter part of the operation, the knife, the beaked bistoury, Bistouri ou Lithotome Caché, cutting gorget, &c., is used, according to the particular preference. The forceps are now introduced into the bladder, and the stone extracted. In the operation, care must be taken not to injure the rectum, or the great arterial vessels, distributed to the perinæum.

A variety of the Lateral Apparatus, called by the French Appareil latéral, consisted in cutting into the bas-fond of the bladder, without touching the neck of that organ; but it was soon abandoned, on account of its inconveniences.

The method of Le Cat and of Pajola—Urethrocysteo-aneurysmatotom'ia — consists in dividing the prostate in part only, — the enlargement of the wound being effected by a peculiar dilator.

The Bilat'eral Operation is founded on that of Celsus. It consists in making an incision posterior to the bulb of the urethra, and anterior to the anus, involving both sides of the perinæum by crossing the raphe at right angles: an incision is then made through the membranous part of the urethra, and the prostate may be cut bilaterally, either with the double lithotome of Dupuytren, or the prostatic bisector of Dr. Stevens, of New York.

5. Lithotomy by the Rectum, Proctocystotom'ia, Sec'tio recto-vesica'lis, (F.) Taille par la Rectum, Taille postérieure, T. Recto-vésicale. This was proposed by Vegetius in the 16th century; but it was never noticed until M. Sanson, in the year 1817, attracted attention to it; since which time it has been successfully performed in many instances. It consists in penetrating the bladder through the paries corresponding with the rectum, by first cutting the spinchter ani and rectum about the root of the penis, and penetrating the bladder by the neck of that organ, dividing the prostate,—or by its bas-fond.

Lithotomy in women, from the shortness of the urethra, is a comparatively insignificant operation.

LIVER, Sax. lifer, Hepar, Jecur, Jec''inus, (F.) Foie. The liver is the largest gland in the body. It is an azygous organ; unsymmetrical; very heavy; and of a brownish-red colour; occupying the whole of the right hypochondrium, and a part of the epigastrium. Above, it corresponds to the diaphragm; below, to the stomach, transverse colon, and right kidney; behind, to the vertebral column, aorta, and vena cava; and before, to the base of the chest. Its upper surface is convex; the lower, irregularly convex and concave, so that anatomists have divided the organ into three lobes,—a large or right or colic lobe;—a lesser lobe, lobule, or inferior lobe, the Lob'ulus Spige'lii,—and a middle or left lobe. At its inferior surface, are observed:—1. A Sulcus or Furrow or Fissure, called horizontal or longitudinal or great fissure, Fossa Umbilica'lis, (F.) Sillon horizontal, longitudinal ou de la veine ombilicale, Sulcus antero-posterior Jec'oris seu horizonta'lis Jec'oris seu longitudina'lis Jecoris seu sinis'ter Jecoris seu Umbilica'lis, which lodges, in the fœtus, the umbilical vein and ductus venosus. 2. The Principal Fissure, termed Sulcus Transversus, Fossa transver'sa, Transverse fossa, Sinus Porta'rum, Porta, P. seu Manus Jec'oris seu Hepatis Fossa or Fissure of the Vena porta, Portal Fiss'ure or Fossa, (F.) Sillon transversal ou de la veine porte, which receives the sinus of the vena porta. 3. The Fissure of the Vena Cava infe'rior, Sillon de la veine cave inférieure, situate at the posterior margin of the organ, and lodging the vena cava inferior. 4. The Lobulus Spige'lii, or posterior portal eminence. 5. The anterior portal eminence, Auri'ga seu Lobulus anon'ymus. 6. Depressions corresponding to the upper surface of the stomach, gall-bladder, arch of the colon, right kidney, &c. Continued from the fossa umbilicalis is a small fossa, called Fossa Ductûs Veno'si, between the left lobe and Lobulus Spigelii. The posterior margin of the liver is very thick; much more so than the anterior. The liver is surrounded by a serous or peritoneal covering, which forms for it a suspensory or broad ligament and two lateral and triangular ligaments. See Falx. The blood-vessels of the liver are very numerous. The hepatic artery and vena porta furnish it with the blood necessary for its nutrition and the secretion of bile. The hepatic veins convey away the blood, which has served those purposes. The lymphatic vessels are very numerous; some being superficial; others deep-seated. The nerves are, also, numerous, and proceed from the pneumogastric, diaphragmatic, and from the hepatic plexuses.

The intimate structure of the parenchyma of the liver has been well studied. When cut, it presents a porous appearance, owing to the division of a multitude of small vessels. When torn, it seems formed of granulations;—the intimate structure of which has given rise to many hypotheses. In these granulations are contained the radicles of the excretory ducts of the bile; the union of which constitutes the hepatic duct. According to Mr. Kiernan, the intimate structure consists of a number of lobules—hepatic lobules, hepatic islets—composed of intralobular or hepatic veins, which convey the blood back that has been inservient to the secretion of bile. The interlobular plexus of veins is formed by branches of the vena porta, which contain both the blood of the vena porta and of the hepatic artery; both of which, according to Mr. Kiernan, furnish the pabulum of the biliary secretion. The biliary ducts form likewise an interlobular plexus, having an arrangement similar to that of the interlobular veins. Mr. Kiernan's views are embraced by many anatomists; but are denied by some.

The liver is the only organ, which, independently of the red blood carried to it by the hepatic artery, receives black blood by the vena porta. The general opinion is, that the vena porta is the fluid which furnishes bile, whilst that of the artery affords blood for the nutrition of the liver. It is probable, however, that bile is secreted from the blood of the latter vessel. Besides bile the liver forms sugar, and is a great assimilating organ.

The liver is liable to a number of diseases. The principal are—Hepati'tis or inflammation, cancer, biliary calculi, encysted and other tumours or tubercles, hydatids, &c.; and it has, at times, been the fashion to refer to it as the cause of symptoms with which it is no wise connected.

LONGEV'ITY, Longæ'vitas, from longus, 'long,' and ævum, 'age,' Macrobio'sis, Macrobi'otes. The prolongation of existence to an advanced age. Haller collected examples of more than one thousand centenarians. He had knowledge of sixty-two persons aged from 110 to 120 years ; of twenty-nine, from 120 to 130 years ; and of fifteen, who had attained from 130 to 140 years. Beyond this advanced age, examples of longevity are much more rare and less sufficiently attested.

The following list of instances of very advanced ages has been given :

It is thick and almost square below ; thin and pointed above. It is attached to the posterior surface of the sacrum, to the transverse processes of all the lumbar and dorsal vertebræ, and to the inferior margin of the last 7 or 8 ribs. It maintains the vertebral column in a straight position ; straightens it when bent forwards, and can even carry it back. It also assists in the rotatory motion of the trunk.

LONGUS, Long.

LONGUS COLLI, (F.) Pré-dorso-cervical, Pré-dorso-atloïdien, (Ch.,) Long du cou. This muscle is situate at the anterior and superior part of the vertebral column. It is long, flat, and broader at its middle than at its extremities, which are pointed. It is attached to the anterior surface of the bodies of the first three dorsal and last six cervical vertebræ ; to the intervertebral ligaments ; to the anterior edge of the transverse processes of the last five cervical vertebræ ; and to the tubercle on the anterior arch of the first. This muscle bends the cervical vertebræ upon each other and upon the dorsal vertebræ. If the upper portion acts on one side only, it occasions the rotation of the atlas on the vertebra dentata ; and, consequently, of the head on the neck.

LUCCA, MINERAL WATERS AND CLIMATE OF. The baths and waters, near this ancient Italian city, have been long celebrated. They are thermal, and resemble, in properties, those of Plombières in France, and of Bath England. They contain carbonic acid, sulphates of alumina, soda, magnesia, and iron. There are ten different sources, the temperature of which varies from 94° to 130° Fahr.

Lucca is much frequented in summer; partly on account of its mineral waters, but more on account of the coolness of the situation.

LUMBAR, Lumba'ris seu Lumba'lis, (F.) Lombaire. From lumbi, 'the loins.' Belonging or having reference to the loins.

LUMBAR ABSCESS, Psoas abscess, Aposte'ma psoat'icum, Absces'sus lumbo'rum, Morbus psoad'icus. This abscess is so called from the matter being found on the side of the psoas muscle, or betwixt that and the iliacus internus. Between these muscles is a quantity of loose, areolar substance; and when an abscess takes place there, it can find no outlet except by a distant course. Generally, it descends along the psoas muscle, forming a swelling immediately beneath Poupart's ligament; at times, however, it extends down the thigh under the fascia. Severe hectic follows the bursting of the abscess, and often death. Its causes are, — scrofula, injury to the loins, &c.

When, from the pain of the back continuing for some time, with other symptoms, the disease is suspected, caustics, or the moxa, applied opposite the transverse processes of the lumbar vertebræ, may be recommended; and, when the abscess is ready for opening, it may be emptied by repeated discharges of the matter, through a small opening, made with a lancet, or small, lancet-pointed trocar. The medical treatment consists in supporting the system, under the great restorative efforts required of it.

LUMBAR ARTERIES are four or five in number on each side. They arise from the sides of the abdominal aorta, and pass behind the muscles situate in front of the lumbar portion of the spine, to gain the broad muscles of the abdomen. They give off, 1. Spinal branches. 2. Anterior, posterior, and external muscular branches.

LUMBAR NERVES are five in number, and issue from the vertebral column by the spinal foramina of the loins. The first lumbar nerve gives off three branches:—the external or ilio-scrotal; the middle or inguino-cutaneous, and the internal or infra-pubian. Along with the three pairs below it, it forms the lumbar plexus.

LUMBAR PLEXUS, Portion lombaire du plexus crural (Ch.), Plexus Lombo-abdominal. This plexus is formed by the union of the Rami communican'tes of the anterior branches of the first four lumbar nerves. It is situate behind the psoas muscle, and before the transverse processes of the lumbar vertebræ. It furnishes, besides the branches which proceed from the first pair, several filaments, that are distributed to the psoas muscle, to the iliacus, the integments, and glands of the groin; and three great branches—the crural, obturator, and lumbo-sacral.

LUMBAR REGION, Lumbi.

LUMBAR VEINS have an arrangement analogous to that of the arteries of the same name. They communicate with the vertebral sinuses, azygous veins, &c., and pass into the vena cava inferior.

LUMBARIS EXTERNUS, Quadratus lumborum—l. Internus, Psoas magnus.

LUMBI, The loin or loins, Lumbar region, (Old Eng.) Lende, (Sc.) Lendis; Re'gio lumba'lis, Lap'ara, Psoa, plural Psoæ, Osphys, Reins, (F.) Lombes. The posterior regions of the abdomen, composed between the base of the chest and the pelvis. The parts which enter into the formation of the lumbar region are,—the skin; a considerable quantity of areolar texture; broad and strong aponeuroses: — the Latissimus Dorsi, Obliquus externus, and Obliquus internus abdominis, Transversalis abdominis, Quadratus lumborum, and the mass common to the Sacro-lumbalis, Longissimus dorsi, and Multifidus spinæ. These muscles surround the lumbar region of the vertebral column. The vessels, nerves, &c., of the loins, are called lumbar.

LUMBO-SACRAL. Belonging to the lumbar and sacral regions. (F.) Lombo-sacré. Bichat calls thus a very large nerve, given off from the anterior branch of the fifth lumbar pair, which descends into the pelvis before the sacrum to join the sciatic plexus.

LUMBRICA'LIS, Vermicula'ris. Resembling a lumbricus, or 'earthworm.' A name given to small muscles, (F.) Lombricaux, met with in the palm of the hand and sole of the foot.

LUMBRICALES MANÛS, Fidicina'les, Flexor primi interno'dii digito'rum manûs seu perfora'tus lumbrica'lis, (F.) Annuli-tendino-phalangiens, Palmi-phalangiens. Four small, fleshy, thin, round, long, fusiform fasciculi, situate in the palm of the hand, and distinguished into first, second, third, and fourth, counting from without to within. They arise from the tendons of the flexor communis digitorum, and are inserted at the outer and posterior side of the superior extremity of the first phalanges of the last four fingers. These muscles bend the fingers on the metacarpus, and fix the tendons of the flexor digitorum communis.

LYME, Lyma.

LYMPH, Lympha, from νυμφη, 'water,' by changing ν into λ. White blood, Lympha Nutri'tia. A name given to the fluid contained in the lymphatic vessels and thoracic duct of animals, which have been made to fast for 24 hours. According to Chevreul, the lymph of the dog contains water, fibrin, albumen, common salt, subcarbonate of soda, phosphates of lime and magnesia, and carbonate of lime. The properties and composition of lymph vary somewhat according to the part whence the lymphatic vessels obtain it. Generally, it is under the form of a transparent, slightly alkaline fluid, sometimes of a madder-red or yellowish colour,—of a spermatic odour, and saline taste; soluble in water, — the solution becoming turbid, when mixed with alcohol. When left to itself, it coagulates. The clot or solid portion becomes of a scarlet red, if put in contact with oxygen; and of a purple red, if placed in carbonic acid.

Like the blood, the lymph consists of a fluid—Liquor lymphæ—in which lymph corpuscles or globules are suspended.

The lymph is probably the product of internal absorption in different parts of the body: it then flows along the lymphatic vessels, uniting with the chyle, and is poured with it into the veins; thus becoming one of the materials of the blood. According to others, the blood, when it reaches the arterial radicles, is divided into two portions, — the one red, which is carried to the heart, — the other serous or white, which is absorbed by the lymphatic vessels, and constitutes the lymph. By others, again, the lymphatics are considered to be the vessels of return for the white blood sent to certain tissues. White blood, however, has probably no existence.

The word lymph is sometimes used unhappily by the surgeon to signify liquor sanguinis.

LYMPHATIC SYSTEM is that particular system of organs which is inservient to the formation and circulation of lymph. These organs are:

1. LYMPHATIC GANGLIONS or GLANDS, see Conglobate.

2. LYMPHATIC VESSELS, Lymphæduc'tus, Lymphangi'a, Lymphange'a, Venæ lymphat'icæ, Ductus sero'si, Vasa lymphatica seu resorben'tia seu hydrago'ga, Hydrangi'a. These are very numerous. Arising at the surface of membranes and in the tissue of the organs, they carry into the veins the lymph from those parts. Lymphatic vessels are found in every part of the body. Wherever they are met with, however, they form two orders, — one superficial, the other deep-seated; — the two orders frequently communicating with each other. Lymphatic vessels are generally smaller than arteries and veins. They are very thin, diaphanous, and cylindrical; but present, here and there, more or less considerable dilatations, caused by valves in their interior. They are slightly tortuous in their course; their anastomoses are very numerous, and they often cross each other, forming successive plexuses. Of the arrangement of the extreme radicles we are ignorant. All the branches, before joining the principal trunks, pass through lymphatic ganglions, in which they are convoluted, or subdivided almost ad infinitum. They are formed of an outer areolar membrane and an internal coat, similar to that of the veins; of the latter, the valves are formed. All the lymphatics of the body ultimately discharge themselves at the junction of the subclavian and internal jugular veins. Two of these trunks are considerably larger than the others, — the thoracic duct, and the great trunk of the right side, (F.) La grande veine lymphatique droite. The former receives the lymphatics of the abdomen, of the lower extremities, the left side of the thorax, the left upper extremity, and the corresponding side of the head and neck; the latter receives those of the right upper extremity, and of the right side of the head, neck and thorax.

MAGNET, Magnes, Magne'tes, Ferrum magnes attracto'rium, Sideri'tes, Sideri'tis, Lapis hera-cle'us seu Syderi'tis seu nau'ticus, Magni'tis, so called from Magnes, its discoverer, or from Magnesia, where it is said to have been first found. (F.) Aimant, Pierre d'Aimant. The magnet or loadstone An amorphous, oxydulated ore of iron, which exerts an attraction on unmagnetized iron, and has the property of exhibiting poles; that is, of pointing by one of its extremities to the north. This ore, by constant or long rubbing, communicates its properties to iron; and thus artificial magnets are formed. Magnetic ore is found in many countries, and particularly in the island of Elba. The magnet is sometimes used to extract spicula of iron from the eye or from wounds. It has been employed as an antispasmodic; but acts only through the imagination. The powder has been given as a tonic. In Pharmacy, it is used to purify iron filings. It attracts the iron, and the impurities remain behind. It formerly entered, as an ingredient, into several plasters, to draw bullets and heads of arrows from the body — as the Emplastrum divinum Nicolai, the Emplastrum nigrum of Augsburg, the Opodeldoch, and Attractivum of Paracelsus, &c.

MAGNETES, Magnet.

MAGNET'IC, Magnet'icus, (F.) Magnétique. Same etymon. That which belongs or relates to magnetism:—mineral or animal.

MAGNETIC FLUID. A name given to the imponderable fluid to which the magnet owes its virtues. By analogy it is applied to a particular principle, supposed to be the source of organic actions, which affects, it is conceived, the nervous system principally, and is susceptible of being transmitted from one living body to another, by contact or simple approximation, and especially under the influence of fixed volition. See Magnetism, Animal.

MAGNETIC PLASTER. A plaster, at present, not used. It has for its base a mixture, called Magnes arsenica'lis; formed of equal parts of antimony, sulphur and arsenic melted together in a glass cucurbit. The name Magnetic plaster was, likewise, given to such as contained powdered magnet.

Mayo), Telluris'mus, Anthropomagnetis'mus, Gar'galē, Gargalis'mus, Gar'galus. Properties attributed to the influence of a particular principle, which has been compared to that which characterizes the magnet. It is supposed to be transmitted from one person to another, and to impress peculiar modifications on organic action, especially on that of the nerves. The discussions, to which this strange belief has given rise, are by no means terminated. There is no evidence whatever of the existence of such a fluid. Highly impressible persons can be thrown into a kind of hysteric or 'magnetic' sleep and somnambulism, (designated by Mr. Braid, hyp'notism, neuro-hyp'notism, and nervous sleep); but farther than this, the efforts of the magnetizer cannot reach. It is a mode of action upon the nerves through the medium of the senses.

MALTA, CLIMATE OF. The climate of Malta is pretty equable, the range of temperature in the twenty-four hours being rarely more than 6°. The air is almost always dry and clear. The most disagreeable wind is the sirocco, which is the source of more or less suffering to the pulmonary invalid. The winter climate is favourable. Dr. Liddell thinks that no place which he has seen in the south of Europe can compete with Malta, for a mild, dry, bracing air in November, December, and part of January; and during the other winter and spring months, he thinks it is equal to any of them.

MAMMA, from mamma, one of the earliest cries of the infant, ascribed to a desire for food. Masthos, Mastus, Mazos, Thelē, Titthos, Titty, Ruma, Uber, ουδαρ, Nutrix, Gemip'oma. The female breast, Pap, Pappe, (Mammil'la, Mamilla being the male breast;) (F.) Mamelle. A glandular organ, proper to a class of animals — the mammalia — and intended for the secretion of milk. The mammæ exist in both sexes, but they acquire a much greater size in the female; especially during pregnancy and lactation. In women, before the age of puberty, the breasts are but little developed. At this period, however, towards the central part of each breast, the skin suddenly changes colour, and assumes a rosy tint. It is of a reddish brown in women who have suckled several children. This circle has a rugous appearance, owing to the presence of sebaceous glands, and is called Are'ola or Au'ε'ola. These glands — Tubercles of the Areola, of Sir Astley Cooper—furnish an unctuous fluid for defending the nipple from the action of the saliva of the sucking infant. In the midst of the aureola is the nipple, a conoidal eminence, of a rosy tint, susceptible of erection, and at the surface of which the galactophorous ducts open. Besides the skin covering them, the breasts are, also, composed of a layer of fatty areolar tissue, more or less thick; of a large gland; excretory ducts; vessels, nerves, &c. See Mammary.

In the animal, the mamma is called the Udder, ουδαρ, Uber, the Bag.

The breasts, plus the space between, are called the bosom, sinus, colpos (κολπος). At times, these terms are restricted to the space between the breasts. (F.) Sein.

Mamma also means a nurse.

MAMMAIRE, Mammary.

MAMMAL, plural Mamma'lia, Mam'mifer, mammif'erous animal; from mamma, 'a breast.' An animal that suckles its young.

MAM'MARY, Mamma'rius, (F.) Mammaire,

from mamma, 'the breast.' Relating to the breasts.

MAMMARY ABSCESS, Mastodynia apostematosa.

MAMMARY ARTERIES are three in number. They are distinguished into—1. The Internal Mammary, Arte'ria sterna'lis, A. Sous-sternal (Ch.), Internal thorac''ic. It arises from the subclavian, and descends obliquely inwards, from its origin to the cartilage of the third rib. Below the diaphragm it divides into two branches; the one external, the other internal. From its origin until its bifurcation, it gives branches to the muscles and glands of the neck, to the thymus, mediastinum, pericardium, and œsophagus. In each intercostal space it gives off internal and external musculo-cutaneous branches, and also, on each side, the superior diaphragmatic. Its two ultimate branches are distributed on the parietes of the abdomen, and anastomose with the external mammary, intercostal, lumbar, circumflexa ilii, and epigastric arteries. 2. The External Mammary Arteries are two in number, and are distinguished into superior and inferior. The superior external mammary, First of the thoracics (Ch.), Superior external thoracic, Superior thoracic, is furnished by the axillary artery. It descends obliquely forwards between the pectoralis major and pectoralis minor, to which it is distributed by a considerable number of branches. The inferior external mammary, the second of the thoracics (Ch.), Long or inferior thoracic, arises from the axillary artery, a little below the preceding. It descends vertically over the lateral part of the thorax; curves, afterwards, inwards; becomes subcutaneous and divides into a number of branches, which surround the breast. It gives branches to the pectoralis major, serratus major anticus, the intercostal muscles, the glands of the axilla, and the integuments of the breast.

MAMMARY GLAND, Glan'dula lactif'era, is the secretory organ of the milk. It is situate in the substance of the breast, to which it gives shape. The tissue of this gland results from the assemblage of lobes of different size, united intimately by a dense areolar tissue. Each of these is composed of several lobules, formed of round granulations, of a rosy white colour, and of the size of a poppy seed. The glandular grains give rise to the radicles of the excretory canals of the mamma, which are called galactophorous or lactiferous. These excretory vessels unite in ramusculi, rami, and in trunks of greater or less size; collect towards the centre of the gland; are tortuous, very extensible, and semi-transparent. All terminate in sinuses, situate near the base of the nipple, which are commonly from 15 to 18 in number. These sinuses are very short, conical, and united by areolar tissue. From their summits, a fasciculus of new ducts sets out, which occupy the centre of the nipple and open separately at its surface. The arteries of the mammary gland come from the thoracic, axillary, intercostal, and internal mammary. The veins accompany the arteries; the nerves are furnished by the intercostals, and brachial plexus; the lymphatic vessels are very numerous, and form two layers. They communicate with those of the thorax, and pass into the axillary ganglions.

MAM'MARY SARCO'MA, Mastoid sarcoma of Abernethy, Emphy'ma sarcoma mamma'rum. A tumour, of the colour and texture of the mammary gland; dense and whitish; sometimes softer and brownish; often producing, on extirpation, a malignant ulcer with indurated edges. Found in various parts of the body and limbs.

MAMMARY VEINS follow the same course as the arteries, and have received the same denominations. The internal mammary vein, of the right side, opens into the superior cava; that of the left, into the corresponding subclavian vein. The external mammary veins open into the axillary vein.

MAMME'A AMERICA'NA, (F.) Abricot sauvage. Ord. Guttiferæ. The systematic name of the tree on which the mammee or mamei fruit grows. This fruit has a delightful flavour when ripe; and is much cultivated in Jamaica, where it is generally sold in the markets as one of the best fruits of the island.

MAMMILLARY EM'INENCE is a name given, 1. To more or less marked prominences on the inner surface of the bones of the cranium, which correspond to the anfractuosities of the cranium. 2. To white, round, medullary tubercles, of the size of a pea, situate at the base of the brain, behind the gray substance from which the Tige pituitaire, of the French anatomists, arises. These Mammillary Tu'bercles, Cor'pora albican'tia seu Candican'tia seu Mammilla'ria seu Pisifor'mia, Bulbi for'nicis, Mammillæ seu Glob'uli medulla'res, Prominentiæ albican'tes, Proces'sus mammilla'res cer'ebri, Protensio'nes glandula'res, Eminen'tiæ candican'tes, Prio'rum crurum for'nicis bulbi, Willis's Glands, (F.) Bulbes de la voûte à trois piliers, Tubercles pisiformes (Ch.), are united to each other by a small grayish band, which corresponds with the third ventricle. They receive the anterior prolongations of the fornix.

Some ancient anatomists, taking the nervous trunks, to which Willis first gave the name of olfactory nerves, for simple appendages of the brain, called them, an account of their shape, Carun'culæ mammilla'res. Vesalius, Fallopius, Columbus, and several others, termed them Proces'sus mammilla'res cer'ebri ad nares. They have also been called Trigo'na olfacto'ria.

It is officinal in the Edinburgh pharmacopœia, and is used in preparing chlorine, solution of chlorine, and solution of chlorinated soda.

MAN'GANESE, SULPHATE OF, Mangane'sii Sulphas seu Protox'idi Sulphas, Sulphate of Protox'ide of Man'ganese. A rose-coloured and very soluble salt, isomorphous with sulphate of magnesia. It is prepared on a large scale for the use of the dyer, by heating, in a close vessel, peroxide of manganese and coal, and dissolving the impure protoxide, thus obtained, in sulphuric acid, with the addition of a little cholohydric acid towards the end of the process. The solution is evaporated to dryness, and again exposed to a red heat, by which the persulphate of iron is decomposed. Water then dissolves the pure sulphate of manganese, leaving the oxide of iron behind.

This salt has been recommended as a cholagogue, in doses of a drachm or two.

The salts of manganese have been recommended in chlorosis and amenorrhœa, and as substitutes for chalybeates generally. The subcarbonate and the oxide have been chiefly employed.

With some, it means insanity. Disorder of the intellect, in which there is erroneous judgment or hallucination, which impels to acts of fury. If the raving be not directed to a single object, it is mania properly so called; if to one object, it constitutes monomania, which term is, however, usually given to melancholy. Mania attacks adults chiefly; and women more frequently than men. The prognosis is unfavourable. About one-third never recover; and they who do are apt to relapse. Separation is one of the most effective means of treatment, with attention to the corporeal condition and every thing that can add to the mental comfort of the patient, and turn his thoughts away from the subjects of his delusion. In the violence of the paroxysms, recourse must be had to the strait waistcoat, the shower bath, &c. Separation should be continued for some weeks during convalescence, with the view of preventing a relapse.

By walking backwards, until the distance from the object is about five times as great as the distance between the two objects, the latter will be found to disappear. Mariotte and, after him, many ophthalmologists, inferred that the optic nerve, on which the ray doubtless falls in this experiment, is insensible; and hence that the choroid may be the seat of vision, — not the retina. The inference is illogical; for it doubtless falls on the part of the optic nerve where the central artery enters, and the central vein leaves the eyeball, and where there is necessarily no neurine.

MARSH, Limnē, Helos, Palus, Sax. mepc, (F.) Marais. Marshy districts give off emanations, which are the fruitful source of disease and the cause of great insalubrity in many countries. The chief disease, occasioned by the malaria or miasm, is intermittent fever. Hence it becomes important to drain such regions, if practicable. Some marshy countries are not so liable to phthisis pulmonalis, and it has been found, that where intermittents have been got rid of by draining, consumption has, at times, become frequent. The most unhealthy periods for residence in a marshy district are during the existence of the summer and autumnal heats; at which times the water becomes evaporated, and the marshy bottom is more or less exposed to the sun's rays. This postulatum seems necessary for the production of the miasmata: for whilst the marsh is well covered with water, no miasm is given off.

MATE'RIA MED'ICA, Pharmacolog''ia, Pharmacol'ogy, Acol'ogy or Akol'ogy or Aceolog''ia, Hylē Iat'ricē, Iamatolog''ia, Iamatol'ogy, (F.) Matière Médicale. The division of medical science which treats of the knowledge of medicines; their action on the animal economy, and mode of administration. The study of the Materia Medica is one of great importance;—it is a study of the tools with which the practitioner has to work in the cure of disease. Much labour has been spent in contriving classifications of the Materia Medica. Some have arranged the articles according to their natural resemblances: others according to their real or presumed virtues: others, according to their active constituent principles. The Pharmacopœias place them alphabetically. Perhaps the best classification would be one founded on the agency exerted by the articles on the different tissues; but this arrangement, in the present state of science, is by no means easy; and, moreover, ideas in regard to the action of medicines are so associated with certain terms, — as narcotics, tonics, sedatives, &c., employed to denote certain operations, which they are esteemed capable of producing, that, to abandon them, would be to throw obstacles in the way of the student, without the ultimate advantage accruing to him of possessing a better knowledge of the modus operandi of medicines than when a classification, somewhat resembling those usually embraced, is adopted.

The following is the classification adopted by the Author, in his "General Therapeutics and Materia Medica, 6th edit., Philad., 1857:—

1. Agents that affect prominently the alimentary canal or its contents, { Emetics, Cathartics, Anthelminthics.
2. Agents that affect prominently the respiratory organs, { Expectorants.
3. Agents that affect prominently the follicular or glandular organs, { Errhines, Sialogogues, Diuretics, Antilithics, Diaphoretics.
4. Agents that affect prominently the nervous system, { Narcotics, Tetanics, Antispasmodics.
5. Agents that affect prominently the organs of reproduction, { Emmenagogues, Parturifacients.
6. Agents that affect various organs, { Excitants, Tonics, Astringents, Sedatives, Refrigerants, Revellents, Eutrophics.
7. Agents whose action is prominently chemical, { Antacids, Antalkalies, Disinfectants.
8. Agents whose action is prominently mechanical, { Demulcents, Diluents.

Of old, the Materia Medica consisted of more articles than at present. The tendency, indeed, is, and must be, to diminish it still further; to get rid of those articles which possess no advantages over others equally common, or whose properties are doubtful. In a dictionary, it becomes necessary to insert all that have been reputed to possess virtues; but the majority are unnecessary. The catalogue might be largely reduced with impunity.

MAXILLARY ARTERIES are three in number. 1. External maxillary — A. Gutturo-maxillaire (Ch.). This arises from the external carotid with the temporal. It is remarkable for its complex course, and for the number of branches which it transmits to the deep-seated parts of the face. Immediately after its origin, it buries itself under the neck of the lower jaw, curving inwards and downwards. It then advances directly inwards; proceeding in the space between the two pterygoid muscles towards the maxillary tuberosity. It turns again, becomes vertical, and ascends into the bottom of the zygomatic fossa, until, having arrived at the floor of the orbit, it takes a horizontal and transverse direction; enters the spheno-maxillary fossa, and divides into several branches. See Artery, (table.)

MAXILLARY BONE, Maxil'la, Mandib'ula, Gam'phelē, Gnathus, Mola, Siagon, Jawbone, (Prov.) Chaffbone, Chall, Chaule, Chavel, Chawbone, Gill, (F.) Mâchoire. A name given to two bones, which support the teeth, and, by means of them, are inservient to the cutting, bruising, and tearing of alimentary substances.

MAXILLARY BONE, INFERIOR, Lower jaw-bone, Os Maxilla'rē inferius, Maxil'la inferior, Hyposi'agon, (F.) Os maxillaire (Ch.), Mâchoire diacranienne, is a symmetrical, nearly parabolic bone, the middle portion of which is horizontal, and called the body; and the posterior is vertical, the angular portions being termed Rami or branches. These have behind a parotidean edge, which forms—by uniting with the base—the angle of the jaw. The branches terminate above by two processes, separated by the sigmoid notch or fossa; the anterior of which is called the coronoid; the posterior, the condyloid process or maxillary condyle, supported by a Cervix, Collum, or Neck. The chief parts observed on the lower jaw are — 1. Externally,—the Sym'physis menti, Apoph'ysis menti, Mental foramen, and the external oblique line. 2. Internally, — the Genian apoph'ysis, the internal or Myloid oblique lines, and the entrance of the dental canal. The lower jaw has, also, an alveolar edge, which contains alveoli for the reception of the teeth. The lower jaw-bone is developed by two points of ossification, which unite at the symphysis of the chin. It is articulated with the temporal bone and with the teeth.

MAXILLARY BONE, SUPERIOR, Upper jaw-bone, Maxil'la superior seu syncra'nia, Os maxilla'rē supe'rius, (F.) Os sus-maxillaire (Ch.), Machoire syncranienne. The upper jaw-bones are to the face what the sphenoid bone is to the cranium. They are articulated with all the portions composing it. They determine, almost alone, the shape of the face, and give it solidity. Their size is considerable; form unequal. They occupy the middle and anterior part of the face; and enter into the composition of the nasal fossæ, orbit, and mouth. The chief parts observable in the upper jaw are — 1. Externally, — the Nasal process, Processus nasa'lis seu fronta'lis seu ascendens, (F.) Apophyse montante, the superior or or'bital surface, Superfic''ies orbita'lis, Planum orbita'lē, which forms almost the entire floor of the orbit, the Fora'men infra-orbita'rium, Zygomat'ic process, Canine or Myr'tiform fossa. 2. Internally,—the Pal'atine process, Ante'rior pal'atine canal, and the Antrum of Highmore. Its circumference is very unequal, and it has behind a round, unequal prominence, called the Maxillary tuberosity, which is pierced by the posterior dental canal. Anteriorly, there is a notch, which forms part of the anterior aperture of the nasal fossæ, and beneath, an eminence, called the anterior nasal spine. The lower part of this circumference forms the alveolar margin. Each superior maxillary bone is articulated with the ethmoid, frontal, nasal, lachrymal, palatine, inferior spongy, vomer, its fellow, the teeth of the upper jaw, and sometimes the sphenoid bone. It is developed by four or five points of ossification.

MAXILLARY NERVES are two in number, and formed of the second and third branches of the fifth pair. The SUPERIOR MAXILLARY NERVE, Nerf sus-maxillaire (Ch.), arises from the middle of the gangliform enlargement of the fifth pair; passes forwards, and issues from the cranium through the foramen rotundum of the sphenoid bone; enters the spheno-maxillary fossa, which it crosses horizontally; passes into the infra-orbitar canal, which it traverses; and makes its exit to vanish on the cheek. It gives off the following branches, — the orbitar, a branch which goes to the spheno-palatine ganglion; posterior dental branches; the anterior dental, — and terminates in the infra-orbitar nerves, which are divided into superior, inferior, and internal. The inferior maxillary nerve, Nerf maxillaire (Ch.), is the largest of the three branches furnished by the fifth pair. It issues from the cranium by the foramen ovale of the sphenoid. Having reached the zygomatic fossa, it divides into two trunks; the one superior and external, which gives off the temporales profundi, masseterine, buccal, and pterygoids;—the other—inferior and internal—the larger of the two, which furnishes the inferior dental, lingual, and auricular.

MAXILLARY VEINS present the same arrangement as the arteries they accompany.

MEDIAN NERVE, Médian digital, (Ch.) This nerve arises chiefly from the anterior branches of the last two cervical nerves and first dorsal. The fifth and sixth cervical pairs also send it a branch, which separates from the musculo-cutaneous nerve. The median nerve descends the inner part of the arm along the biceps muscle. Opposite the elbow joint it buries itself behind the aponeurosis of that muscle, and engages itself between the two fasciculi of the pronator teres. Lower down, it is situate between the flexors — sublimis and profundus — and passes, with their tendons, under the anterior annular ligament; it then divides into five branches, which are distributed to the muscles of the thenar eminence, to the lumbricales, the integuments of the thumb, the index, middle finger, and outer part of the ring finger. This nerve gives no branches to the arm. In the forearm, it furnishes filaments to all the pronator and flexor muscles; and one of them accompanies the anterior interosseous artery. It also gives off a filament to the integuments of the palm of the hand.

Median Veins. Three of the superficial veins of the forearm are so called. The median basilic —the median cephalic and common median or funis brachii. See Basilic and Cephalic.

A membranous space formed by the approximation of the pleuræ, dividing the chest into two parts, the one right, the other left. The mediastinum, formed by a double reflection of the pleura, extends from the spine to the posterior surface of the sternum. Its anterior part, called Anterior mediastinum, Mediastinum pectora'lē, lodges, at its upper part, the thymus gland in the fœtus, and is filled below with fatty, areolar tissue. Its posterior part, parallel to the spine, is occupied by the œsophagus, vena azygos, thoracic duct, the lower part of the windpipe, the origin of the bronchia and a number of lymphatic glands. This part is called the posterior mediastinum—Mediastinum dorsa'lē.

By some anatomists, Mediastinum is defined to be the pleural walls of the membranous space, whilst the space itself is termed Cavum mediasti'ni.

The medullary substance that lies within the cranium upon the basilary process of the occipital bone. The anterior surface which rests in the basilary groove, is impressed by the basilary artery. At the upper extremity, and on its posterior surface are the Tubercula quadrigemina. At the same extremity, the medulla gives rise to two prolongations, the peduncles of the brain, separated from each other by the mammillary eminences, and becoming lost in the optic thalami. The lower extremity is called the tail or Rachid'ian bulb, Bylbus medull'æ spina'lis seu rachid'icus, (F.) Bulbe rachidien, and is continuous with the medulla spinalis. It is to this part only that some anatomists apply the name Medulla oblongata. From the posterior angles two other prolongations arise, called Peduncles of the cerebellum. The medulla oblongata has several eminences — the Pons varolii, Corpora pyramidalia, C. olivaria, &c.—and it has a longitudinal fissure before, and another behind, called the anterior and posterior median fissures. The vesicular neurine in the centre of the medulla is the nervous centre of respiration and deglutition: hence it has been called centrum vitæ'le.

MEDULLA OSSIUM, Marrow — m. Spinæ, M. spinalis.

It commences at the foramen magnum of the occipital bone, and descends in the vertebral canal as low as the 2d lumbar vertebra, without filling it; presenting, in its course, several evident enlargements. It is grooved on both its anterior and posterior surfaces by a furrow, which divides it, in its whole length, into two great nervous cords, intimately united with each other. It terminates by an oval tubercle, whence a number of nerves set out called Cauda equi'na, (F.) Queue de cheval, from its resemblance to a horse's tail. The spinal marrow has no analogy, as regards its structure, with the marrow of long bones. It is formed of two substances; one white, the other gray, presenting an inverse arrangement to that which they have in the brain, the white being external, the cineritious at the centre, Substan'tia gri'sea centra'lis. It is enveloped by a yellowish, fibrous membrane, very resisting, which seems to be continued insensibly from the pia mater, and by two other membranes, which are merely prolongations of the arachnoid and dura mater. See Nerve.

This membrane has been considered as a species of internal periosteum of those bones. It has numerous vessels, which bury themselves in the thickness of the marrow; and others which nourish the innermost plates of the bone. The cells formed by it are termed Cel'lulæ seu Sac'culi medulla'res.

bones; the other is found merely in the central canal of long bones.

MEDULLARY TUMOUR OF THE LUNGS, Phthisis, cancerous.

MEMBRANE, Membra'na, Hymen, Meninx, Epen'dyma, Pan'nicle. A name given to different thin organs, representing a species of supple, more or less elastic, webs; varying in their structure and vital properties, and intended, in general, to absorb or secrete certain fluids; and to separate, envelop, and form other organs. Bichat has divided the membranes into simple and compound.

Simple membranes comprise three orders. 1. A Mucous membrane, Membra'na muco'sa seu pituito'sa seu pituita'ria, Phleg'mymen, Phlegmat'hymen, Membrane folliculeuse (Ch.), is so called, on account of the mucous fluid by which it is constantly lubricated. Mucous membranes line the canals, cavities, and hollow organs, which communicate externally by different apertures on the skin. Bichat refers them to two great divisions—the gastro-pulmonary, and the genito-urinary. The mucous membranes have a striking analogy with the cutaneous tissue, in organization, functions, and diseases. They are composed of chorion, papillæ, and epidermis; and are furnished with a multitude of follicles, which secrete a viscid humour,—mucus. They receive a quantity of arterial vessels, veins, lymphatics, and nerves. 2. The Serous membranes, Membra'næ sero'sæ, M. villeuses simple (Ch.), are transparent, thin, and composed of one lamina. One surface adheres to other textures; the other is smooth, polished, and moistened by a serous fluid. They are arranged—in the form of sacs without apertures—as great, intermediate reservoirs for the exhalant and absorbent systems, in which the serous fluid, in passing from one system, tarries some time before it enters the other. The serous membranes resemble the areolar membrane in structure and diseases. They facilitate the motion on each other of the organs which they envelop. They may be divided into (a) Serous membranes, properly so called; as the arachnoid, pleura, peritoneum, and tunica vaginalis. (b) Synovial membranes or capsules; which belong to joints, tendons, aponeuroses, &c. These membranes—mucous and serous—are constituted of similar layers—epithelium, basement membrane, condensed areolar tissue; and a looser form of areolar tissue, termed submucous in one case,—subserous in the other. 3. Fibrous membranes, Membranes albugineuses (Ch.) These are almost all continuous, and terminate at the periosteum—their common centre. They have been divided into two sections. 1. Enveloping aponeuroses, Aponeuroses of insertion, Fibrous capsules of the joints, and Fibrous sheath of tendons. 2. The Periosteum, Dura mater, Sclerotica, Tunica albuginea testis, Fibrous membrane of the spleen, &c. The fibrous membranes are not free or moistened by any particular fluid. They adhere by both surfaces to the neighbouring parts; are firm, resisting, but slightly elastic, and of a white colour; sometimes pearly and glistening. Their vessels are numerous, in some, as in the dura mater and periosteum; in others, scarcely perceptible, as in the aponeuroses. The presence of nerves has never been proved, although several circumstances, regarding their sensibility, render their existence probable. The fibrous membranes serve, in general, to augment the solidity of the organs which they envelop; to retain the muscles in their respective positions; to favour the motion of the limbs, and that of the muscles and skin; to form canals and rings for the passage of different organs, &c.

Bichat admits three species of Compound Membranes. 1. The Sero-fibrous, formed of a serous and fibrous lamina, intimately adherent to each other;—as the pericardium, dura mater, and tunica albuginea. 2. The Sero-mucous, formed of a serous and mucous lamina;—as the gall-bladder at its lower part. 3. The Fibro-mucous, constituted of the union of a fibrous and mucous membrane; as the mucous membrane of the nasal fossæ, gums, &c. Chaussier admits six kinds of membranes. 1. The laminated. See Cellular Tissue. 2. The serous or simple villous. 3. The follicular or complicated villous. 4. The muscular or fleshy. 5. The albugineous. 6. The albuminous.

MEMBRANE, ACCIDENTAL, M. false—m. Accidentelle, M. false—m. Adnée, Conjunctiva—m. Adventitious, M. false—m. Anhistous, Decidua.

MEMBRANE, BASEMENT, Pri'mary or lim'itary membrane, Membra'na pro'pria. A delicate, structureless lamella of membrane found beneath the epidermis or epithelium, on all the free surfaces of the body.

These accidental membranes occur on the skin after the application of a blister; on mucous surfaces, as in croup; on the parietes of inflamed veins and arteries, &c. The cicatrices of wounds are formed of them.

Of late, it has been proposed to give the name pseudo-membrane to fibrinous exudations, which are devoid of organization, whilst neo-membrane may be applied to such fresh productions as have become supplied with vessels and nerves.

More or less indisposition and irritability also precede each successive recurrence of the menstrual flux. In temperate climates, each period, men'strual period, periodus luna'ris, ordinarily continues from three to six days; and the quantity lost varies from four to eight ounces The menses continue to flow from the period of puberty till the age of 45 or 50. At the term of its natural cessation, Menolip'sis, Ménecpausis (Gardanne), Menopau'sis, the flux becomes irregular; and this irregularity is occasionally accompanied with symptoms of dropsy, glandular tumours, &c., constituting the Parame'nia cessatio'nis of Good, and what is called the critical time or turn or change of life; yet it does not appear that the mortality is increased by it. With the immediate causes of menstruation we are unacquainted. We express only our ignorance, when we assert it to depend upon periodicity; the discharge comes from the vessels of the uterus and vagina, and differs from ordinary blood by its peculiar odour, and by its not coagulating. It is evidently connected with the condition of the ovaries, and—it has been supposed —with the periodical discharge of ova from them. It is arrested, as a general principle, during pregnancy and lactation. In warm climates, women usually begin to menstruate early, and cease sooner than in the temperate regions. The quan tity lost is also greater. In the colder regions, the reverse of this holds as a general rule.

Dried menstrual blood, especially of a woman in her first menstruation—Sanguis vir'ginis primum menstrua'tæ—was formerly given internally as an anti-epileptic.

When effusion exists on one side, the measurement is usually greater than on the other. When, on the other hand, a portion of a lung has ceased, for some time, to exert its respiratory functions, the corresponding side of the chest becomes smaller, in consequence of the contraction of the pleura, retraction of the pulmonary tissue, and greater approximation of the ribs.

This affection is more frequent in the female than in the male, and especially in those who have had children. The tumour, formed by merocele, is generally small, round, and more or less difficult of reduction. In other respects, it possesses all the characters of hernia. The neck of the sac has, close on the outside, the epigastric artery; above, the spermatic cord and spermatic artery in the male — the round ligament in the female; on the inside, Gimbernat's ligament; and below, the pubes. When the obturator artery arises from the epigastric, it generally passes on the outside of and below the orifice of the sac; sometimes, however, it takes a turn above, and then to the inside of the opening. J. Cloquet asserts, that of 134 cases, in one only did he find the epigastric artery on the inside of the orifice of the sac.

The operation, required in strangulation of this variety, may be practised on the aponeurotic opening, by cutting downwards and inwards on the side of Gimbernat's ligament.

MES'ENTERIC, Mesara'ic, Mesenter'icus, Mesara'icus, Mesaræ'icus, (F.) Mésentérique, Mésaraïque; from μεσεντεριον, or μεσαραιον, 'the mesentery.' That which relates or belongs to the mesentery.

MESENTERIC ARTERIES are two in number, and distinguished into, 1. The Superior mesenteric, which arises from the anterior part of the abdominal aorta, below the cœliac. It immediately descends to the left, forwards, behind the pancreas, and in front of the third portion of the duodenum,—to gain the superior extremity of the mesentery, where it makes a long curvature, the convexity of which is turned forwards and to the left. Towards the termination of the ileum, it ends by anastomosing with a branch of the A. colica dextra inferior. At its concavity, it gives off the three Arteriæ colicæ dextræ, which belong to the great intestine; and, at its convexity, it sends off fifteen or twenty branches, which are distributed to the small intestine, after having formed numerous arches by their anastomoses.

2. The Inferior Mesenteric Artery arises from the anterior part of the abdominal aorta, an inch and a half before its termination. It descends, on the left side, behind the peritoneum; engages itself in the substance of the iliac mesocolon, forming a considerable curvature, whose convexity faces the left side. When it reaches the brim of the pelvis, it passes along the posterior separation of the mesorectum, and attains the neighbourhood of the anus, under the name Superior hemorrhoidal artery. It gives off no branch at its concave part; but, from the convex, the three Arteriæ colicæ sinistræ arise.

MESENTERIC DISEASE, Tabes mesenterica.

MESENTERIC GLANDS are the lymphatic ganglions of the mesentery. Through them, the chyliferous vessels pass to the thoracic duct. Their uses are unknown. When diseased, nutrition is interfered with, and atrophy produced.

MESENTERIC HERNIA. If one of the layers of the mesentery be torn by a blow, whilst the other remains in its natural state, the intestines may insinuate themselves into the aperture, and form a kind of hernia. It is not known during life.

MESENTERIC PLEXUSES are furnished by the solar plexus, and have been distinguished into superior and inferior; like the mesenteric arteries which they accompany.

MESENTERIC or MESARAIC VEINS are two in number, and belong to the vena porta. They are distinguished into, 1. The Superior mesenteric or mesaraic or great mesaraic. This trunk receives, from above to below and on the right side, the three venæ colicæ dextræ and the Gastro-epiploica dextra. Into its left side, the veins of the small intestine open. It passes in front of the transverse portion of the duodenum; and, behind the pancreas, unites with the splenic vein to concur in the formation of the vena porta.

The inferior or lesser mesenteric vein corresponds to the artery of the same name, and opens into the splenic, near the union of that vein with the superior mesenteric, and behind the pancreas.

The pain is here deeper seated and more immediately in the mesenteric region. The external tenderness is less than in some of the other varieties of peritonitis.

(F.) Mésentère. A term in anatomy, applied to several duplicatures of the peritoneum, which maintain the different portions of the intestinal canal in their respective situations; allowing, however, more or less motion. They are formed of two laminæ, between which are contained the corresponding portion of intestine and the vessels that pass to it. One only of these duplicatures has received the name mesentery, properly so called. This belongs to the small intestine, which it suspends and retains in situ. Its posterior margin, which is the smallest, is straight, and descends obliquely from the left side of the body of the second lumbar vertebra to the right iliac fossa. Its anterior margin is curved, undulating, plaited, and corresponds to the whole length of the small intestine. The mesentery contains, between the two laminæ which form it, a number of lymphatic ganglions; the trunks and branches of the mesenteric vessels; the nervous plexuses accompanying them, and many lacteals and lymphatics.

The transverse mesocolon arises from the concave arch of the colon, and forms a septum between the epigastric and umbilical regions. Its inferior portion is continuous with the mesentery. The left lumbar mesocolon, which contains the ascending colon, is continuous below with the Iliac mesocolon. The last includes between its layers the sigmoid flexure of the colon, and ends in the mesorectum. METAGEN'ESIS, (F.) Metagénèse, Altern'ate genera'tion, from μετα, and γενεσις, 'generation.' A term, proposed by Professor Owen, to express the changes of form, which one animal species undergoes in a series of successively produced individuals, extending from the one developed from the ovum to that which becomes the imago or last perfected individual. This term he employs in contradistinction to metamorphosis, which he restricts to the changes of form undergone by one and the same individual. See Generation, alternate.

METAL, Metal'lum. From μεταλλαω, 'I seek after.' A class of simple, combustible bodies; distinguished from others by considerable specific gravity; a particular splendour; almost total opacity; insolubility in water; and the property they have of ringing when struck. Metals have no effect, except of a mechanical nature, when taken into the stomach; unless they have already undergone, or undergo in the stomach, oxidation or union with an acid; when, at times, deleterious compounds may be formed. Copper cents; half-pence; quicksilver; lead, have frequently been swallowed in the metallic state with impunity. Tin and mercury are the only metals prescribed for a mechanical effect; the former as an anthelmintic,—the latter, idly enough, in cases of fancied intussusception.

Oculo'rum* seu metamorphop'sis seu myo'des, Imagination (Maître-Jean); Crupsia, Marmar'ygē, Marmor'ygē, Mac'ulæ ante oc'ulos volitan'tes, Marau'gia, Oc'uli mármarygo'des, Vis'io phantas'matum, Visus defigura'tus, False sight, (F.) Berlue. Aberration of the sense of sight, which transmits the image of imaginary objects. This affection sometimes depends on a slight opacity in the transparent parts of the eye; the cornea, crystalline, or vitreous humour, when

It is symptomatic and of no consequence. At other times, it appears to be idiopathic; and occurs particularly in those who have been in the habit of constantly fixing their eyes on very brilliant or small bodies. The objects fancied to be seen are various. They are sometimes circular, perpetually moving; or shining, or black spots, cobwebs, insects, or pieces of wool — when they are often termed Muscæ seu Flocci volitan'tes, (F.) Mouches volantes, and the condition Visus musca'rum, Scotom'ata, Suffu'sio Myo'des, Myiodeop'sia, Myïdop'sia, Myodeopsia, Myodeso'pia, Visus musca'rum. These appea ances sometimes continue for a few days; being dependent on the state of the nerves of the individual, at the time; or they may exist for life, and ultimately impair the sight. Certain of them change their position, and appear to be seated in the humours of the eye, and—it has been supposed—in the vitreous humour more especially: hence the term entohy'aloid muscæ applied to them.

If the affection be symptomatic, it is of but little moment. If idiopathic, and connected with any excitement of the brain, which is not often the case, attention will have to be paid to that organ.

A change in the seat of a disease; attributed, by the Humorists, to the translation of the morbific matter to a part different from that which it had previously occupied: and by the Solidists, to the displacement of the irritation. It has also been used in the same extensive sense as Metaptosis. Disputes have often been indulged, whether a case of metastasis ought not rather to be esteemed one of extension of the disease. The phenomena of gout and acute rheumatism are in favour of metastasis occasionally supervening.

METASTAT'IC, Metastat'icus, (F.) Métastatique. Belonging or relating to metastasis. A metastatic crisis is one produced by metastasis:—a metastatic affection, one caused by metastasis, &c. See Abscess, metastatic.

METASYN'CRISIS, from meta, and συγκρινω, (συν, and κρινω, 'I choose,' 'I judge.') Recomposi''tion. A word employed by some disciples of Asclepiades. This physician supposed, that all animals are formed by the union or assemblage of atoms. He designated all bodies by the word συγκριματα, which signifies 'assemblage. Συγκρινεσθαι, 'to be assembled,' was, with him, synonymous with 'to exist;' and διακρινεσθαι, 'to separate,' was, with him, synonymous with 'to dissolve,' 'to cease to exist.' The word Metasynerisis was invented to express the recomposition of bodies after their momentary dissolution. Some have rendered the word by the Latin Recorpora'tio.

METATAR'SAL, Metatar'seus, (F.) Métatarsien. Same etymon as metatarsus. Relating or belonging to the metatarsus.

Metatarsal Artery, Artère sus-métatarsienne of Chaussier, arises from the Arteria dorsa'lis Tarsi; passes transversely over the back of the foot; and furnishes, at its convexity, which is anterior, three branches, called A. interos'seæ dorsa'les Pedis. These branches are distributed in the interosseous spaces.

Metatarsal Articula'tions are those resulting from the junction of the metatarsal bones with each other. They are strengthened, behind, by dorsal and plantar ligaments; and before, by a transverse metatarsal ligament, which is plantar, and has the greatest analogy to the inferior transverse metacarpal ligament.

Metatarsal Bones, (F.) Os métatarsiens, are five in number, and distinguished by their number; first, second, third, &c., reckoning from the outer side.

METEOROL'OGY, Meteorolog''ia, from μετεωρος, (meta, and αιωρεω, 'I lift up,') 'a meteor,' and λογος, 'a discourse.' The science, whose object is a knowledge of the origin, formation, appearance, &c. of meteors. The state of the atmosphere has a most important bearing upon the health of animals. Every epidemic affection has its causes seated there. Meteorological conditions have, hence, ever been attended to by the physician for the purpose of detecting the precise character of any particular epidemic influence. The barometer, thermometer, and hygrometer are the instruments used with this intent—to detect, as well the varying weight or pressure, and the temperature, as the moisture. Perhaps, of the three conditions, the last exerts more influence in the production of disease than either of the others. Our knowledge, however, of this part of physics is extremely limited and unsatisfactory.

A sect of physicians whose doctrine was in vogue after that of the Empirics and Dogmatists, towards the end of the first century. According to the Methodists, of whom Themison was the chief, almost every disease is dependent on contraction or relaxation — strictum or laxum. To these two causes, they added a third — mixed or compound—to include those affections which partook of the two characters. The doctrine, medici'na method'ica, resembled, in some respects, that of Brown.

METHODOL'OGY (MEDICAL), Methodolog''ia Med'ica, from μεθοδος, 'method,' and λογος, 'a discourse.' A word used, by the French more especially, to signify method applied to the study of any science. Medical Methodology, consequently, means method applied to the study of medicine.

An effusion of blood from the inner surface of the uterus, either at the menstrual or other periods; but in a greater quantity than proper. Uterine hemorrhage may be caused by those influences which produce hemorrhage in general. It happens, however, more frequently during pregnancy, and during or after delivery, when the vascular system of the uterus is so circumstanced as to favour its occurrence more than at other periods. The termination of metrorrhagia is usually favourable. Should it, however, be very copious, or frequently recur; or should it happen to a great extent after delivery, death may take place very speedily; and, in some cases, without the discharge being perceptible; constituting internal hemorrhage.

Uterine hemorrhage may be active or passive; requiring obviously a different treatment. The main management is similar to that of hemorrhage in general;—the horizontal posture; acid drinks; free admission of cool air; cold applications to the loins, thighs, and abdomen; injection of cold water, even of iced water, into the vagina; plugging the vagina, so as to prevent the discharge per vaginam, and thus induce a coagulum in the mouths of the bleeding vessels. Such will be the special plan adopted where the hemorrhage has occurred in one not recently delivered. In uterine hemorrhage after delivery, the same cooling plan must be followed; but, as the flow of blood is owing to the uterus not contracting so as to constringe its vessels, pressure must be made on the abdomen to aid this; and, if necessary, the hand must be introduced into the uterus to stimulate it to contraction. Should the female be excessively reduced, so as to render the accoucheur apprehensive that she may expire from loss of blood, brandy may be exhibited. The profuse exhibition of opium in such cases is, at least, a doubtful plan.

Transfusion has, at times, been practised as a last resource.

METRORRHEU'MA, Rheumatis'mus U'teri, Hysteral'gia rheumat'ica seu catarrha'lis, Metri'tis rheumat'ica, (F.) Rhumatisme de l'utérus; from metra, and ρευμα, 'defluxion,' 'rheumatism.' Rheumatism of the uterus.

'I contaminate.' Miam'ma, Mian'sis, Mia'ria, Mias'mus, Inquinamen'tum, Molyn'sis, Conta'gium. The word miasm has, by some, been employed synonymously with contagion. It is now used more definitely for any emanation, either from the bodies of the sick, or from animal and vegetable substances, or from the earth, especially in marshy districts, (Marsh poison, Efflu'vium palus'trē, Gas palus'trē, (F.) Intoxication des Marais,) which may exert a morbid influence on those who are exposed to its action. To these terrestrial emanations—the Koino-mias'mata of Dr. E. Miller, of New York — the Italians give the name aria cattiva, but, more commonly, malaria ('bad air'); a word which has been adopted into other languages. The deleterious effluvia, originating from the decomposition of matter derived from the human body, have been called by Dr. Miller, Idiomias'mata; the epithets Koino and Idio being derived respectively from κοινος, 'common,' and ιδιος, 'personal.' Of the miasms which arise either from the animal body or from the most unhealthy situations, we know, chemically, nothing. All that we do know is, that, under such circumstances, emanations take place, capable of causing disease in many of those who are exposed to their action.

MILK, Sax. melc, Lac, Gala, Humor lac'teus, Latex ni'veus, (F.) Lait. A fluid secreted by the mammary glands of the females of the mammalia. The skimmed milk of the cow, (F.) Lait de Vache, contains water, caseous matter, traces of butter, sugar of milk, chloride of sodium, phosphate, and acetate of potassa, lactic acid, lactate of iron, and earthy phosphate. The cream is formed of butter, casein, and whey, in which there is sugar of milk and salts. When examined by the microscope, milk is seen to contain a large number of particles, of irregular size and shape, varying from $\frac{1}{2500}$th to $\frac{1}{3000}$th of an inch in diameter. They consist of oily matter, surrounded by a delicate pellicle, and are the milk globules.

Cow's milk is employed for the preparation of cream, butter, cheese, whey, sugar of milk, and frangipane. It is useful in a number of cases of poisoning; either by acting as a demulcent, or by decomposing certain poisons, or by combining with others so as to neutralize them. It is constantly employed as aliment, and may be regarded as an emulsion in which butter and casein are found in suspension. When taken into the stomach, it is coagulated by the gastric fluids, and the coagulum is digested like any other solid. The watery parts are absorbed.

Between milk, flour, and blood, there is great similarity of composition. The following table is given by Dr. Robert Dundas Thomson:

Milk.	Flour.	Blood.
Curd or Casein	Fibrin, Albumen, Casein, Gluten,	Fibrin, Albumen, Casein, Colouring matter.
Butter.....	Oil.	Fat.
Sugar.....	Sugar, Starch,	Sugar.
Chloride of potassium, ——— sodium, Phosphate of soda, ——— lime, ——— magnesia, ——— iron,	Do.	Do.

From a considerable number of experiments, Messrs. Deyeux and Parmentier class the six kinds of milk, which they examined, according to the following table, as regards the relative quantity of materials they contain.

Casein.	Butter.	Sugar of Milk.	Serum.
Goat	Sheep	Woman	Ass
Sheep	Cow	Ass	Woman
Cow	Goat	Mare	Mare
Ass	Woman	Cow	Cow
Woman	Ass	Goat	Goat
Mare	Mare	Sheep	Sheep

Milk and Soda Water. An agreeable mode of taking milk in cases where it lies heavily on the stomach. Heat, nearly to boiling, a teacupful of milk; dissolve in it a teaspoonful of sugar, put it into a large tumbler, and pour over it two-thirds of a bottle of soda water.

Milk, Asses', (F.) Lait d'Ânesse, considerably resembles human milk, of which it has the consistence, smell, and taste: but it contains a little less cream, and more soft, caseous matter. It is often used by those labouring under pulmonary affections.

Artificial Asses' Milk may be made by taking gelatin ℥ss; dissolving it, by the aid of heat, in barley water Oij; adding refined sugar ℥j; pouring into the mixture new milk Oj; and beating the whole with a whisk.

It may also be prepared by dissolving sugar of milk ℥ij in tepid skimmed cow's milk Oj.

Milk Blotch, Porrigo larvalis — m. Crust, Porrigo larvalis.

Milk, Ewes', (F.) Lait de Brebis. It affords more cream than cows' milk; but the butter is softer. The caseum, on the contrary, is fatter, and more viscid. It contains less serum than cow's milk. The Roquefort cheeses are made from it.

Milk Fever, see Fever, milk — m. Glass, Breast glass — m. Globules, see Milk.

Milk, Goats', (F.) Lait de Chèvre, resembles cows' milk: the butyraceous matter, however, which enters into its composition, is more solid than that of the cow.

Artificial Goat's Milk may be made by taking fresh suet ℥j; cutting it into small pieces; tying it in a muslin bag, large enough to leave the morsels free from compression; and boiling in a quart of cow's milk, sweetened with a quarter of an ounce of white sugar candy.

Used as a diet in scrofulous cases, and also in phthisis.

Milk, Green, Colostrum.

Milk, Human, (F.) Lait de femme,—contains more sugar, milk, and cream, and less caseum, than cows' milk. Its composition differs according to the distance of time from delivery.

Milk Sickness, Sick stomach, Swamp sickness, Tires, Slows, Stiff joints, Puking fever, River sickness. A disease occasionally observed in the States of Alabama, Indiana, and Kentucky, which affects both man and cattle, but chiefly the latter. It is attributed in cattle to something eaten or drunk by them; and in man to the eating of the flesh of animals labouring under the disease. Owing to the tremors that characterize it in animals, it is called the Trembles. It is endemic.

The symptoms of the disease are such as are produced by the acro-narcotic class of poisons—vomiting, purging, extreme nervous agitation, &c.: and the approved indications of treatment appear to be—gentle emetics and laxatives, with quiet, and mucilaginous drinks.

The subdivision of the wine pint has, accordingly, been extended to the 60th part of the fluidrachm; and glass measures, called "minim-measures," have been adopted by the London College. The proportion between the minims and the drops of various fluid preparations is exhibited in the following table. The results were obtained by Mr. Durand, a skilful pharmacien of Philadelphia, under circumstances, as regards the different articles, as nearly identical as possible.

MOD'ELLING PROCESS. A term proposed by Dr. Macartney, of Dublin, to signify the mode in which wounds are healed without inflammation or suppuration, by a deposit of plastic matter from the surface of the wound, by which the gap is more rapidly filled,—portion being laid upon portion, without waste, after the manner of clay in the hands of the sculptor; — hence the term.

MODI'OLUS, 'the nave of a wheel.' Pyr'amis seu Axis seu Columel'la cochlee. A hollow cone in the cochlea of the ear, forming a nucleus, axis, or central pillar, round which the gyri of the cochlea pass. The modiolus forms the inner and larger portion of the central pillar, and is the cavity seen at the bottom of the meatus auditorius internus. It lodges a branch of the auditory nerve. The central portion of the modiolus contains a number of minute canals, and is called in consequence Tractus spira'lis foraminulo'sus. Into these the nerves of the cochlea enter, and pass out at right angles between the bony plates forming the zona ossea of the lamina spiralis, to be expanded on the membranous portion of the lamina.

MODIOLUS, Mas, also means the crown of the trepan.

The following classification will convey some idea of the ways in which different organs may be excited into action.

1. By actual or immediate contact of the remedy, and by absorption or mediate contact.
2. By an impulse conveyed by the nerves, through an impression made on the stomach or elsewhere.
3. By contiguous or continuous sympathy, or by mere proximity or continuity of parts.

MOLAR, Mola'ris, My'licus, (F.) Molaire, Meulière. That which bruises or grinds; from mola-ris, 'a grindstone,' or mola, 'a millstone,' (molo, 'I grind.')

MOLAR GLANDS. Two small bodies formed by a collection of mucous crypts; seated in the substance of the cheeks, between the masseter and buccinator muscles, and whose excretory ducts open into the mouth opposite the last molar tooth.

MOLAR TEETH, Grinders, Jaw Teeth, Mola'res permanen'tes dentes, Dentes molares seu maxilla'res seu gom'phii seu clava'les, Molæ, Gomphioi, My'lacri, Mylodontes, My'lodi, Momis'ci, Lagteeth, Wall teeth, (Prov.) Azzle teeth, Axle teeth, Cheek teeth, Wang teeth, (F.) Dents molaires ou mâchelières, occupy the farther part of each alveolar arch. Their coronæ are broader than they are high: unequal; tuberculated: and the roots are more or less subdivided. They are 20 in number, 10 in each jaw. The first two pairs of molar teeth in each jaw have been called lesser molares, premo'lar or bicuspid, Dentes bicuspida'ti seu bucca'les. The coronæ have two tubercles; the outer being more prominent and larger than the inner. The root is commonly simple; sometimes bifurcated. The other three pairs have been termed, Great molares—Dentes multicuspidées (Ch.) Their coronæ are cubical, rounded, and have, at the upper surface, four or five tubercles, separated by deep furrows. The root is divided into two, three, four, and five fangs, which are more or less curved. The third great molaris appears a long time after the others, and hence has been called Dens sapien'tiæ or Wisdom tooth.

MOLASSES, Melasses.

MOLE, Mola, from moles, 'mass.' Mylē, Zephyr'ius fœtus, Germen falsum, Pseudocyc'sis molaris, Gravid'itas molaris, Mooncalf, old French, Fardeau. A fleshy, insensible, at times, soft—at others, hard—mass; of variable and determinate size, which forms in the uterus, and is slightly united by vessels to that organ; from which its feeble vitality is derived. It has been conceived by some to be always owing to imperfect conception; but moles may form in the undoubted virgin. They seem to be owing to a morbid process; and certainly are generally connected with conception. At times, they contain parts of the fœtus; but commonly do not. At very different periods, in different women, the diseased mass is expelled from the uterus, with ordinary symptoms of abortion; and the case requires similar management. See, also, Nævus, and Conception, (false.)

MOLE PLANT, Euphorbia lathyris.

MOLEC'ULAR, Molecula'ris. Of or belonging to molecules or minute portions of any thing. Hence molecular death, in contradistinction to somatic death.

MOL'ECULE, Molec'ula, Mass'ula; diminutive of moles, 'a mass.' A minute portion of any body. Also, the cicatric'ula, ma'cula, gallatu'ra, gelat'inous molecule, tread of the cock, or embryo part of the impregnated ovum, observable by the microscope before the ovum has left the ovarium of the hen. It lies under the epidermic coats of the yelk, and upon its proper coat. If the ovum, according to Valentin, be lacerated and its contents minutely examined, the cicatricula is found like a grayish white disk, which in its whole periphery is dense, granulous, and opake; but in the centre presents a clear, nongranulous, and perfectly diaphanous point. Purkinje found, that when he removed the dark granulous mass by suction with a small tube, there remained a perfectly transparent vesicle filled with a pellucid lymph, which had a decidedly spherical form, but, being extremely delicate, was easily lacerated, and then its fluid escaped. As he found this, which later naturalists have named—after its discoverer—the Purkin'jean ves'icle, in the ova of the ovary, but could not see it in ova, which had already entered the oviduct, he gave it the name germinal vesicle, or germ cell, vesic'ula prœ'ifera seu germinati'va, (F.) Vésicule germinative. Besides a perfectly colourless fluid, this contains one or more dark corpuscles, which appear as a nucleus through the including membrane in the shape of opake spots—the germinal spot, mac'ula germinati'va seu ger'minans, nu'cleus germinati'vus, Blasto-car'dia, Cor'culum ger'minis, (F.) Tache germinative. The granulous membrane—its thickened portion, the so-called 'cicatricula,' —and the germinal vesicle, constitute those parts of the ovum which pass immediately into the original foundation of the embryo, the blastoderma or germinal membrane, vesic'ula blastodermat'ica, blastoder'mic vesicle.

The disease generally affects all the bones; but it is especially remarkable during life in the long bones, which assume any curvature that may be wished. Very violent pain is often experienced in them; and the urine frequently contains an enormous proportion of calcareous phosphate. The patient is compelled to remain in the horizontal posture; the bones no longer being fixed points for the muscles to act upon. The disease has, hitherto, always terminated fatally, and dissection has exhibited the gelatinous nature of the bones; which, by desiccation, have become transparent, as if they had been macerated in acid.

Experience has afforded no means of relief in this dreadful affliction. The alkaline salts, earthy phosphates, &c. are of little or no use.

MOLLITIO, Mollities.

MOLLITUDO, Mollities.

MOLLUS'CUM, Athero'ma, Ochthi'asis. A cutaneous affection, so called in consequence of its resemblance to certain molluscous animals. It consists of numerous tumours, varying in size from that of a pea to that of a pigeon's egg, filled with an atheromatous matter, which are developed in the substance of the derma, and are of various shapes, some having a large base, — others adherent by means of a pedicle.

Molluscum contagio'sum, (F.) Acné molluscoïde, a singular variety, is characterized by the presence of hard, round, tubercles, which are smooth and transparent, and when pressed, pour out from an orifice in their summits a little opake or milky fluid.

The disease is probably seated in the sebaceous follicles.

If internal treatment be adopted at all, it must consist of eutrophics, as arsenic, iodine, &c. The external treatment consists in the employment of measures calculated to excite the tubercles to inflammation, as by touching them with potassa.

Amongst the numerous hypotheses entertained on the origin or cause of monsters, or of monstrosity—teratol'sis, monstros'itas, (F.) monstruosité, as the state has been called—three only are worth mentioning. They have been attributed, 1. To the influence of the maternal imagination on the fœtus in utero. 2. To accidental changes, experienced by the fœtus at some period of its uterine existence: and 3. To a primitive defect in the germs. The second seems to be the only one that is philosophical.

As a medico-legal question, monsters, if capable of action as individuals, have the same rights as other persons.

MONT-DE-MARSAN, MINERAL WATERS OF. Mont-de-Marsan is a small French town, 10 leagues from Dax; where there is a chalybeate spring, somewhat frequented.

MONT-D'OR, MINERAL WATERS OF. Mont-d'Or is a village seven leagues from Clermont, (Puy-de-Dôme,) at which are several mineral springs, cold and thermal. Those of the Fountain La Madelaine, and of the Great Bath, are thermal, temp. 112° Fahr., and contains carbonic acid, subcarbonate and sulphate of soda, chloride of sodium, subcarbonate of lime and magnesia, alumine and oxide of iron. Those of St. Margaret are cold, and contain much carbonic acid.

MONTECATI'NI, MINERAL WATERS OF. This town is situate near Borgo-Buggiano, in Tuscany. The springs are thermal; ranging from 78° to 118° Fahrenheit.

MONTPELL'IER, CLIMATE OF. This seat of a celebrated medical school in the S. E. of France was at one time renowned for its climate, and especially in regard to its adaptation to consumptive cases. This is now exploded, and it is at present esteemed an unfit residence for them. The climate possesses the general characters of that of south-eastern France—being dry, hot, and irritating; subject to frequent vicissitudes, and especially to blasts of keen, cold, northerly winds. It is, indeed, most injurious in pulmonary diseases.

MOON, Luna, Sele'nē, Menē, Sax. Mona, (G.) Mond, (F.) Lune. The moon has been supposed to exert considerable influence over the human body, in health and disease. Such influence has been grossly exaggerated. Not many years ago, it would have been heretical to doubt the exacerbation of mania at the full of the moon; yet it is now satisfactorily shown, that if the light be excluded at this period, the lunatic is not excited more than ordinarily.

MOR'PHICA, from μορφη, 'shape.' Monstrosities of birth.' The 3d order, class Typhica of Good.

MORPHI'NA, Mor'phia, Mor'phium, Morphi'nē, Morphine, from Μορφευς, Morpheus, the 'god of sleep.' A solid, colourless alkali; crystallizable in beautiful pyramids, truncated and transparent; soluble in alcohol, and slightly so in boiling water. It exists, combined with meconic acid, in opium. It may be obtained by decomposing, by means of ammonia or calcined magnesia, an aqueous solution of opium made in the cold.

The following is the process of the Pharm. U. S. Opium, sliced, lbj; distilled water, alcohol, animal charcoal, each a sufficient quantity; solution of ammonia, f℥vj. Macerate the opium with four pints of distilled water for 24 hours, and having worked it with the hand, digest for 24 hours, and strain. Macerate the residue twice successively with distilled water, and strain. Mix the infusions: evaporate to six pints, and filter; then add first five pints of alcohol, and afterwards three fluidounces of the solution of ammonia, previously mixed with half a pint of alcohol. After 24 hours, pour in the remainder of the solution of ammonia, mixed as before with half a pint of alcohol; and set the liquor aside for 24 hours, that crystals may form. To purify these, boil them with two pints of alcohol till they are dissolved; filter the solution, while hot, through animal charcoal, and set it aside to crystallize.

Morphia dissolves perfectly in the acids, which it saturates; and with which it forms very crystallizable salts, with the exception of the acetate. All these salts have a bitter taste, and act upon the animal economy in the same manner as opium, but more powerfully. The acetate is the salt commonly employed in medicine. It was, at one time, supposed that Morphia is the purely sedative part of opium, divested of its irritating properties; but experience has not confirmed this. On the contrary, it will generally disagree where opium does. Dose of morphia, $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ of a grain.

MORPHI'NÆ ACE'TAS, Mor'phiæ Acetas, Mor'phium ace'ticum, Ac''etate of Morphine, Acetate of Morphia. A salt formed by saturating morphia with acetic acid. (Morphia, in powder, freed from narcotina by boiling with sulphuric ether, ℥j; distilled water, Oss; acetic acid, a sufficient quantity. Mix the morphia with the water; then carefully drop in the acid, constantly stirring until the morphia is saturated and dissolved. Evaporate the solution in a water-bath to the consistence of syrup. Lastly, dry the acetate with a gentle heat and rub it into powder.—Ph. U. S.) Dose, from $\frac{1}{8}$ of a grain to half a grain.

MORPHI'NÆ SULPHAS, MOR'PHIÆ SULPHAS, Sulphate of Morphia. A salt, formed by saturating morphia with sulphuric acid, evaporating, and crystallizing. Dose, the same as of the acetate.

Muriate, and Citrate of Morphia, Morphiæ citras, have likewise been used; but they possess no advantages over the other salts. The sulphate and muriate are official in the Ph. U. S. The muriate—MOR'PHIÆ MU'RIAS—is directed to be prepared as follows. (Morphiæ, in pulv., ℥j; Aquæ destillatæ, Oss; Acid. muriat. q. s. Mix the morphia with the water; carefully drop in the acid, till the morphia is saturated and dissolved. Evaporate and crystallize.) One-sixth of a grain is equal to a grain of opium.

MORPHOLOG''ICAL, Morpholog''icus, from μορφη, 'shape,' and λογος, 'a description.' That which has relation to the anatomical conformation of parts. Applied, at times, to the alterations in the form of the several parts of the embryo, in contradistinction to histological, which is applied to the transformation by which the tissues are gradually generated. In comparative anatomy, it is applied to the history of the modifications of forms, which the same organ undergoes in different animals.

MORTAL, Morta'lis, from more, mortis, 'death.' Letha'lis, Leta'lis, Thanato'des, Thanas'imus, (F.) Mortel. That which is subject to death; — that which causes death: — as, man is mortal; a disease is mortal. Of old, it was the custom to have a division of mortal or deadly wounds, which gave rise to many errors in medico-legal investitions, as the mortality of wounds depends upon various circumstances; and it is often a matter of extreme difficulty to pronounce whether or not a wound is necessarily mortal.

MORTAL'ITY, Mortal'itas, Lethal'itas, Letal'itas, (F.) Mortalité. Same etymon. This word, taken in an extended sense, expresses the condition of all organized bodies,—of being subject to the cessation of life. In the sense in which it is most frequently employed, it signifies,—the proportional quantity of individuals who, in a certain population, die in a given time. If we assume the population of the earth to be one thousand millions, and a generation to last thirty-three years; in that space of time the one thousand millions must all die, and, consequently, the number of deaths will be, by approximation,

Each year	30,000,000
Each day	82,109
Each hour	3,421
Each minute	57
Each second	1 nearly.

If, on the other hand, as has been supposed, the number of deaths is to that of the births as TEN to TWELVE: there will be born,

Each year	36,000,000
Each day	98,356
Each hour	4,098
Each minute	68
Each second	1 & 2-15ths.

It has been estimated that the average mortality of the Pays du Vaud, is 1 in 49; of Sweden and Holland, 1 in 48; of Russia, 1 in 41; of France, 1 in 40; of Austria, 1 in 38; of Prussia and Naples, 1 in 33 to 35; of England, 1 in 45; and of South America, 1 in 30. The same rate of mortality has been given to the United States as to France; but the statistical details on all this matter have been inadequate, and—it is not improbable—inaccurate. The following has been given as the annual mortality of some of the chief cities of this country and Europe: (See the author's Human Health, p. 101: Philadelphia, 1844.) Philadelphia, 1 in 45·68; Glasgow, 1 in 44; Manchester, 1 in 44; Geneva, 1 in 43; Boston, 1 in 41·26; Baltimore, 1 in 41; London, 1 in 40; New York, 1 in 37·83; St. Petersburg, 1 in 37; Charleston, 1 in 36·50; Leghorn, 1 in 35; Berlin, 1 in 34; Paris, Lyons, Strasburg, and Barcelona, 1 in 32; Nice and Palermo, 1 in 31; Madrid, 1 in 29; Naples, 1 in 28; Brussels, 1 in 26; Rome, 1 in 25; Amsterdam, 1 in 24; and Vienna, 1 in 22½.

In the cities, the mortality under two years of age bears a large ratio. This is exhibited by the following table:

Ages.	London.	Philad.	Baltimore.
Under 1 year, } From 1 to 2, }	28·52	22·7	24·11
2 to 5,	9·97	7·3	11.18
5 to 10,	4·33	4·	5·
10 to 20,	4·03	5·	6·3
20 to 30,	6·64	12·	9·87
30 to 40,	8·08	12·	10·58
40 to 50,	8·89	10·	8·88
50 to 60,	8·89	7·2	5·78
60 to 70,	9·15	5·	4·5
70 to 80,	7·83	3·5	3·
80 to 90,	3·18	1·9	1·67
90 to 100,	0·40	0·5	0·26
100 to 120,	——	0·09 }	0·18
110 to 120,	——	0·013 }

It would not be proper to regard the value of life in different countries, or in different periods in the same country, to be indicated by the average mortality; inasmuch as in one case a greater mortality may occur amongst children, and in another amongst adults.

MORTALITY, BILLS OF, Bills of Necrol'ogy, Mor'tuary Reg''isters, (F.) Tables de Mortalité. Tables, instituted for the purpose of exhibiting the number of deaths, &c., in a given time. Well-kept bills of mortality are of great use to the physician and political economist. Those of London were proverbial for their inaccuracy and insufficiency; especially as regards the complaints of which the persons have died. They were formerly made out by the parish clerks, and the information was conveyed to them by two old women, who were appointed in each parish, and were called Searchers; — their duty being to see that the deceased had died a natural death. This miserable system has, however, been abolished; and the Registrar-General's annual reports of births, deaths, and marriages, exhibit how admirably vital statistics are now collected in Great Britain.

MOTION, Motus, Mo'tio, Mota'tio, Mota'men, Commo'tio, Permo'tio, (movere, motum, 'to move.') Cine'sis, Movement, (F.) Mouvement. The act of changing place. The various motions may be divided into,—First, the voluntary or those that are executed under the influence of the brain. Secondly, the involuntary, which may be subdivided into, 1. The excited, of the reflex function of Dr. Marshall Hall and others,—as the closure of the larynx on the contact of acrid vapours, of the pharynx on that of the food, — a function of the spinal marrow; and, 2. Those that are executed under the organic and other nerves of involuntary function. It is probable, too, that every living tissue is capable of moving responsive to its appropriate irritant. See Irritability.

MOTOR OCULI EXTER'NUS, Nervus tim'idus, (F.) Nerf oculo-musculaire externe (Ch.), Nerf moteur oculaire externe, Sixth pair of nerves, arises from the furrow which separates the pons Varolii from the medulla oblongata. It enters the cavernous sinus; anastomoses on the outside of the carotid artery with two filaments furnished by the superior cervical ganglion; enters the orbit by the sphenoidal fissure, and is lost on the rectus externus oculi. This pair is, also, called Abducentes.

MOTO'RES OCULO'RUM, Moto'rii Oculorum, Ocula'res communes, Ophthal'mici exter'ni, Common Oculo-muscular Nerves, (F.) Nerfs moteurs oculaires communs (Ch.), The third pair of nerves, Par ter'tium. This nerve arises from a depression at the inner side of the peduncles of the brain, between the tuber annulare and corpora mammillaria. It enters the outer part of the cavernous sinus, and passes into the orbitar cavity. Behind the sphenoidal fissure, it divides into two branches; the one superior and the other inferior. The former is lost on the rectus superior oculi and the levator palpebræ superioris; the latter — the larger of the two — divides into three branches, which pass to the rectus internus, rectus inferior, and lesser oblique. The last furnishes a filament, which passes to the ophthalmic ganglion.

MOUTH, Sax. mu$, Os, Cavum Oris, Stoma, Gab, (Sc.) Mow, (Prov.) Gob, (F.) Bouche. This word sometimes signifies the cavity situate between the jaws, and containing the tongue, &c.; —at others, the outer orifice of that cavity. The mouth, in the first acceptation, Cav'itas seu Spa'tium Oris, is the cavity; bounded, above, by the palatine arch; below, by the tongue; before, by the lips; and behind, by the velum palati and pharynx. The sides of the mouth and the organs it contains are lined by a mucous membrane The anterior aperture of the mouth is, sometimes, called facial—the posterior, pharyngeal. In the mouth are the teeth, gums, alveolar margins, tongue; the excretory ducts of the salivary glands, and those of a number of mucous follicles, &c. It is in this cavity that the food is cut, torn, or bruised by the teeth; is impregnated with saliva, and formed into a mass or bolus, which is then subjected to the act of deglutition. The mouth contains the organs of taste; and it serves in respiration, articulation, expectoration, suction, &c.

The condition of the mouth requires to be attended to in Semeiology. The state of the mucous membrane, like that of the tongue, indicates the condition of the membrane of the alimentary canal generally.

MOXA, Moxibu'rium. A word by which the Chinese and Japanese designate a cottony substance, which they prepare by beating the dried leaves of the Artemisia moxa,—a kind of mugwort. With this down they form a cone, which is placed upon the part intended to be cauterized, and is set fire to at the top. The heat and pain gradually increase, in proportion as the combustion proceeds downwards, until ultimately an eschar may be formed. In Europe and this country, the same operation is usually practised with a cylinder of cotton-wool, or with one formed from the pith of the greater sun-flower. This mode of cauterization is employed as a powerful counter-irritant; which it assuredly is. Sloughing may be in some measure prevented, according to Baron Larrey, by the application of liquid ammonia to the burnt part.

The term moxa has been extended to any substance, which by gradual combustion on or near the skin is employed as a counter-irritant, — as the electric or galvanic moxa or cautery, in which voltaic electricity is employed as the cauterizing agent.

A substance, analogous to vegetable mucilage; from which, however, it differs, by affording subcarbonate of ammonia on distillation. Mucus exudes through the skin, in a state of combination with a peculiar oily matter; and, drying, forms the epidermis. It constitutes, in part, the different epidermeous productions, as the hair, nails, wool, and horn of animals, feathers of birds, and scales of fish. It is found at the surface of the mucous membranes, and presents some difference in its composition and properties, according to the particular mucous membrane from which it is obtained. Its chief organic constituent is an albuminoid compound,—mucin, mucosin. Mucus preserves the membranes moist, and in a state best fitted for the performance of their functions. The French give the term glaire to the thick, stringy mucus, secreted by the mucous membranes when in a state of disease.

When mucus is examined with the microscope it is found to contain numerous epithelial scales or flattened cells; together with round, granular bodies, commonly termed mucous corpuscles or mucous globules, which are contained in a fluid portion—liquor muci.

MURMUR, (F.) Murmure. A word existing both in the Romanic and Teutonic languages, and probably a variety of onomatopœia;—mur mur expressing the kind of sound which the word indicates. A low continued or continuously repeated sound, as that of flame, or of a stream running over a stony bottom.

MURMUR AURIUM, Tinnitus Aurium—m. Intestinale seu intestinorum seu Ventris, Borborygmus.

MURMUR, RES'PIRATORY. (F.) Bruit respiratoire. The noise heard during inspiration and expiration, especially the former. It is produced by the passage of the air through the bronchial tubes and into the air-cells. It has been also called murmur of the expansion of the lungs, (F.) Bruit d'expansion pulmonaire; and, when distinctly vesicular, Respiration of the cells or vesicular respiration, (F.) Respiration ou murmure vésiculaire. Vesicular respiration is of course absent when the cells of the lungs have been obliterated from any cause. We may then have the Respiration nulle, Absence du bruit respiratoire, Silence, and Respiration silencieuse of the French writers.

At times, it is rude during inspiration or expiration, or both — the Respiration rude or R. râpeuse of the French. At others, there is a blowing sound, (F.) Souffle, Respiration soufflante, as if some one were blowing into the auscultator's ear through a tube. This is heard in the healthy state over the larynx, trachea. (F.) Souffle trachéal, and about the bifurcation of the bronchia, (F.) Souffle bronchique; but when it proceeds from the lungs it denotes disease. It may be tubular or diffused. In the former, the whiffing murmurs appear to occur in a space limited to the immediate neighbourhood of the part examined. In the latter, they are produced with but moderate intensity, and sometimes at a distance from the ear, over a tolerably extended space.

The respiration, perceived over the trachea and bronchia in health, is called tracheal or bronchial or tubal, (F.) Respiration bronchique, Souffle tubaire, according to the situation in which it is heard.

MURMUR, UTERINE, Bruit placentaire—m. Utero-placental, Bruit placentaire.

MUSA PARADISI'ACA, Musa, M. Mensa'ria seu Cliffortia'na, Amusa, Palma hu'milis, Ficus In'- dica, Bata, Plat'anus, Plantain tree. Family, Musaceæ. Sex. Syst. Hexandria Monogynia. It grows in many parts of India and South America. The fruit, which is largely eaten for bread, consists of a mealy substance, Plantain meal, Conquin-tay. It is clammy; has a sweetish taste, and will dissolve in the mouth without chewing. The whole spike of fruit often weighs forty or fifty pounds. The leaves of the tree serve the Indians for tablecloths and napkins. Being smooth and soft, they are also employed as dressings for blisters. The water from the soft trunk is astringent, and sometimes used in diarrhœa.

MUSA SAPIEN'TUM. The Bana'na tree, Baco'ba, (F.) Bananier, Bacove. This differs somewhat from the last. The fruit, Bana'na, (S.) Platano, is shorter, straighter, and rounder; the pulp softer and of a more luscious taste. When ripe, it is very agreeable; it is eaten like the plantain, and relished by all ranks of people in the West Indies. Both varieties are natives of Guinea.

MUSCADIER, Myristica moschata.

MUSCERDA, Moschardina.

MUSCLE, (old Eng.) Brawn, Mus'culus, Torus, Lacer'tus, Mys, Myon, from μυς, 'a mouse or rat;' because, say some etymologists, the ancients compared the muscles to flayed mice or rats. According to Diemerbroeck, Douglass, Chaussier, &c., μυων comes rather from μυειν, 'to close,' 'to move,' &c., a function proper to muscles. This etymon is the more probable. Muscles have been divided into those of Animal life or of the life of relation — voluntary muscles — which execute movements under the influence of the will; as the muscles of the limbs, head, trunk, &c., and into those of organic life—involuntary muscles—which contract under the influence of certain special stimuli; as the heart, fleshy fibres of the stomach, &c. Mixed muscles are those which belong partly to each of these divisions; — as the muscles of respiration; the sphincters, &c. Muscles that act in opposition to each other are called antagonists; thus, every extensor has a flexor for an antagonist, and conversely. Muscles that concur in the same action are termed congenerous. The muscles present numerous varieties in form, size, situation, use, &c., and have been divided, by some, into long, broad, and short. Each of these divisions comprises simple and compound muscles. Simple or rectilinear muscles have all their fibres in a similar direction, and only one body—as the Sartorius, Pronator quadratus, &c. Compound muscles are those which have only one belly and several tendons, as the flexors of the fingers and toes; or several bellies and several tendons, — as the biceps flexor cubiti, sacro-lumbalis, &c. To the compound muscles belong, also, the radiated muscles. Their fibres set out from a common centre, and are arranged like the radii of a circle; — such are the diaphragm, iliacus, temporal, &c. Pennated or Penniform Muscles. Their fibres are arranged in two rows, which are united at a median line, at greater or less angles; nearly as the feathers are inserted into a quill. The palmaris longus is one of these. Semi-penniform muscles: their fibres are oblique, as in the last case; but they are inserted only on one side of the tendon. Hollow Muscles are,—the heart, intestines, urinary bladder, &c.

Much difference has existed in the enumeration of muscles. Some authors reckon them at upwards of 400. Chaussier admits only 368. The greater part of them are in pairs. Very few are azygous.

Muscles have been variously named. 1. According to their uses, as diaphragm, buccinator, extensors, flexors, adductors, abductors, levators, depressors, &c. 2. According to their position, as interspinales, interossei, subclavius, poplitæus, anconeus, cubitalis, iliacus, temporalis, &c. 3. According to their shape, as trapezius, splenius, lumbricalis, serratus, digastric, deltoid, scalenus, rhomboides, &c. 4. According to their dimensions, as pectoralis major, rectus capitis anticus major, pectoralis minor, glutæus maximus, medius, and minimus. 5. According to their direction, as obliquus abdominis, transversalis abdominis, rectus femoris, rectus abdominis, &c. 6. According to their composition, as semi-membranosus, semi-tendinosus, complexus, &c. 7. According to their attachments, or the different points of the skeleton with which they are connected by means of tendons or aponeuroses; as sterno-cleido-mastoideus, sterno-hyoideus, &c. On this is grounded the nomenclature of M. Dumas, and that of Chaussier.

The end of the muscle, which adheres to the most fixed part, is usually called the origin or head, (F.) Tête; and that which adheres to the more moveable part, the insertion or tail, (F.) Queue; the intervening part or body of the muscle being called the venter or belly, Venter mus'culi, Me'dium mus'culi, (F.) Ventre: hence the names gastrocnemii, digastricus, biceps, and triceps; according as they have two bellies, two or three heads, &c.

Muscles are formed, — 1. Essentially of the muscular or fleshy fibre, (see Muscular Fibre.) 2. Of Areolar tissue, which unites together the fibres. This areolar tissue is not very visible between the fine and loose fibres; but becomes more so, when they unite in more considerable fasciculi. It forms, moreover, to each muscle, an external envelope, which unites it to the neighbouring parts, and admits of its motion. This envelope was formerly called Tu'nica pro'pria musculo'rum. 3. Of Arteries. These proceed from neighbouring trunks, and are, generally, very large. Their size and number are always in proportion to the bulk of the muscle. With the exception of some viscera, as the lungs and the kidneys, there are few organs that receive as much blood as the muscles. 4. Of Veins. They follow the same course in the muscles as the arteries. Bichat asserts that they are generally devoid of valves. 5. Of Lymphatics. Of these we know little, and cannot easily follow them between the fleshy fibres. 6. Of Nerves. These are numerous, and of different sizes. They, almost all, proceed from the encephalon; some, however, issue from ganglions, and accompany the arteries. In general, they penetrate the fleshy tissue along with the vessels, with which they are closely united. After they have entered the muscles, they divide and subdivide until they are lost sight of.

Muscular Ar'teries. Arteries that are distributed to the muscles. The name, Muscular Arteries of the eye, has been especially given to two branches sent off by the ophthalmic artery: — the one, inferior, which furnishes branches to the rectus inferior oculi, lachrymal sac, &c., and some of the anterior ciliary arteries: the other —the superior, which is sometimes wanting; but, when it exists, gives branches to the rectus superior oculi and levator palpebræ superioris.

Muscular Contrac'tion. The exertion of the power, possessed by muscles, of shortening themselves, or of contracting to produce motion: — muscular motion being the change in the situation and relation of organs, induced by muscular contraction. When a muscle contracts, its fibres assume more the zigzag direction, and the extremities approximate; but the bulk of the whole muscle is not augmented. This contraction takes place, at times, with extreme velocity: a single thrill, in the letter R, can be pronounced in the 1-30,000th part of a minute. The force of contraction, Myody'namis, depends upon the healthy physical condition of the muscle, combined with due energy of the brain. The duration, in voluntary motion, is for a certain time dependent upon the will:—contractions, excited involuntarily, cannot be so long maintained.

Muscular Current. A current, which, according to Matteucci, exists in every living muscle, whose tendinous extremities are not equally disposed—one, for example, forming a cord; the other broad and ribbon-like — and which circulates in the muscle from the tendinous extremity to the muscular surface.

Muscular Fibre, Fleshy fibre, Filum muscula'rē, Fibril'la muscula'ris. A name given to the filaments, which, by their union, form the muscles. This fibre is flat, soft, downy, linear, but little elastic, and more or less red. It is firmer in adults than in the young or the aged; of the same size in the great and small muscles; and runs its course without bifurcation or ramification. It is but slightly resisting in the dead body, tearing readily; but during life it supports very great efforts without laceration. It is, itself, composed of a considerable number of fibrils, similar to each other, and subdividing almost ad infinitum. The ultimate filaments into which the fibre can be decomposed by mechanical means seem to be hollow or tubular. The fibre exists under two forms, the striated or striped, (F.) Fibre striée, and the non-striated, smooth, or unstriped, (F.) Fibre lisse; the muscles composed of the former ministering, as a general rule, to the animal functions,—the latter always, perhaps, to the organic. The colour of the muscular fibres is red in man, and white in several animals. A greater or less number, — united in fasciculi, Fascic'uli seu Lacer'ti musculo'rum, approximated to each other, and forming a distinct mass, of very variable size and shape, the extremities being attached to bones by means of tendons, — constitutes a muscle. In this are included areolar membrane, vessels and nerves. See Muscle.

Muscular Nerves. The nerves distributed to the muscles are so named. Winslow calls the 4th pair of nerves — Nerf musculaire oblique supérieur.

It descends on the anterior and outer part of the leg, — at first, hid among the muscles; becomes superficial about the middle of the leg; and divides into two branches, which pass superficially on the back of the foot. Two musculo-cutaneous nerves—superior and inferior—proceed from the first lumbar. The superior musculo-cutaneous — il'io-scrotal, il'io-hypogas'tricus — which divides into two branches,—abdominal and scrotal. The inferior musculo-cutaneous is smaller than the superior, and is distributed as its name, il'io-in'guinal, indicates.

NAIL, Sax. nægl, (G.) Nagel, Unguis, Onyx, (F.) Ongle. A whitish transparent substance, similar to horn, which covers the dorsal extremity of the fingers. Three portions are distinguished in it; the extremity, which is free, at the end of the finger;—the body or middle portion adherent by its inner surface; and the root, Radix seu Matrix unguis, Int'imum unguis, (F.) Matrice de l'ongle. The last presents two distinct parts; the one, terminated by a thin, serrated edge, is buried in a duplicature of the skin, Vallec'ula unguis, which acts the part of a nail-follicle; the other, called Lu'nula seu Semilu'nula seu Sele'nē seu Arcus seu Exor'tus seu Anat'olē seu Albe'do un'guium, is whitish and of a semilunar shape, and is situate above the part where the epidermis terminates. The nails are composed of a horny tissue, of the same nature as that which forms the hoofs, horns, and scales of different animals. When the nail has been torn off, the papillæ of the skin become covered by a soft, whitish lamina, whose consistence gradually augments. New laminæ are then formed underneath, and give the nail the thickness it ought to possess. The corneous substance, being thus constantly produced at the extremity of each of these laminæ, the whole of the nail is pushed forwards, and it would grow indefinitely, were it not cut or worn by friction.

The nails protect and support the extremities of the fingers against the impression of hard bodies. They are, also, useful in laying hold of small bodies; and dividing those that have but little consistence.

The Polish nobleman, Borwlaski, who was well made, clever, and a good linguist, measured 28 Paris inches. He had a brother, 34 inches high, and a sister 21. Two remarkable Indian dwarfs were exhibited in the United States and in Europe, about the middle of the 19th century, under the name of 'Aztec children,'—the boy, from 7 to 8 years of age, was 33$\frac{3}{4}$ inches in height, and weighed 20$\frac{3}{4}$ pounds:—the girl, from 4 to 6 years of age, was 29$\frac{1}{2}$ inches high, and weighed 17 pounds. NAPIUM, Lapsana, Sinapis.

NAPLES, (CLIMATE OF.) The climate of Naples in its general characters resembles that of Nice, but it is more changeable: the sirocco too, which is little known in Nice, is severely felt at Naples. It is not a good residence for the phthisical invalid: Sir James Clark, indeed, considers it altogether unsuitable.

At times, narcotism is confined to a state of more or less profound stupor; and constitutes, in certain cases, a useful remedial condition; at others, it is a true poisoning, characterized by vertigo, nausea, a state of intoxication or apoplexy, constant delirium, convulsive motions, &c. Emetics in strong doses, and not much diluted with water; purgatives and glysters are the first means to be used in this condition. The stupor may afterwards be combated by the use of exciting and stimulating drinks.

NARCOSIS FOLLICULO'RUM. A state of the scalp, which Mr. Erasmus Wilson conceives to be dependent upon torpid action of the hair follicles, and in which the scalp and hair are found covered with a yellowish, dirty-looking powder, composed of an admixture of granular particles and furfuraceous scales.

Substances, which have the property of stupefying; — as opium, stramonium, hyoscyamus, belladonna, &c. They are used in medicine as soothing agents; exerting their special influence on the brain and tubular matter of the spinal marrow. In small doses, as a general rule, narcotics stimulate; in large, they act as sedatives. The following is a list of the chief narcotics: — Aconitum, Ætherea, Belladonna, Camphora, Cannabis, Conium, Digitalis, Humulus, Hyoscyamus, Lactucarium, Opium and Morphia, Stramonii Folia, Stramonii Semina, Mental Narcotics, (Appropriate Music, Monotonous sounds, or any succession of monotonous impressions.)

A solid, white, inodorous, and insipid substance; by some considered to be alkaloid; by others neuter; crystallizable in straight prisms with a rhomboidal base; fusible like the fats; soluble in boiling alcohol and ether, and scarcely soluble in water. Narcotine produces all the unpleasant effects of opium; but, at the same time, throws the animal into a state of stupor. It is not used in medicine, on account of these objections. The salts, which are very bitter, have been used successfully in India for the cure of intermittents.

NARCOTISM, Narcosis.

NAR'COTIZED, Tor'pidus, Narco'des. Affected with stupor, as from the use of a narcotic.

NASAL, Nasa'lis, from nasus, 'the nose.' That which relates to the nose.

NASAL ARTERY. This is the largest of the two branches in which the ophthalmic artery terminates. It issues from the orbit, above the tendon of the orbicularis palpebrarum, passes above the side of the root of the nose, and anastomoses with the last extremity of the facial. Haller gave the name nasal to the spheno-palatine. He also called the dorsales nasi, furnished by the external maxillary, Nasa'les latera'les.

Nasal Bones, Ossa nasi seu nasa'lia, Ossic'ula nasi, Ossa maxil'læ superio'ris quarta seu quinta seu secun'da, (F.) Os nasaux, Os propres du nez. These bones are situate beneath the nasal notch of the os frontis, and occupy the space between the nasal or angular processes of the superior maxillary bone. Their shape is nearly quadrilateral. They have an external or cutaneous surface, an internal or nasal, and four margins. Each is articulated with its fellow, with the os frontis, ethmoid, and superior maxillary bones. They ossify from a single point.

Nasal Car'tilage, Cartila'go triangula'ris Nasi. A cartilage formed of three portions, which unite at the dorsum nasi, and are distinguished into the cartilage of the septum, and the lateral cartilages. This cartilage is continuous, above, with the ossa nasi, and, inferiorly, with membranous fibro-cartilages, which form the supple and movable part of the nostrils. They are two in number—the one before, the other behind.

Nasal Duct, Lachrymal duct—n. Eminence, Mesophryon.

Nasal Fossæ, Cavi na'rium, Nares inter'næ. Two large, anfractuous cavities, situate between the orbits below the cranium, and lined by the pituitary or Schneiderian membrane. These cavities have no communication with each other; but the various sinuses in the neighbouring bones—the ethmoidal, sphenoidal, superior maxillary, &c.—all communicate with them. The general cavity of each nostril is divided by the ossa spongiosa into three meatus or passages, which run from before backwards. 1. The Meatus narium supe'rior, placed at the upper, inner, and back part of the superior spongy bone. 2. The Meatus me'dius, situate between the superior and inferior spongy bones; and 3. The Meatus infe'rior, situate between the inferior spongy bone and the bottom of the nose. The Schneiderian membrane receives the first pair of nerves, and various branches from the fifth pair. The arteries are furnished by the branches of the internal maxillary, known under the names of spheno-palatine, infra-orbitar, superior alveolar, palatine, pterygo-palatine; by the supra-orbitar, and ethmoidal branches of the ophthalmic artery; by the internal carotid, superior labial, and dorsales nasi. Its veins are little known, and generally follow the course of the arteries. The lymphatics are almost unknown. The nasal fossæ are the seat of smell; they aid, also, in respiration and phonation.

Nasal Meatus, see Nasal fossæ.

Nasal Mucus, Mucus na'rium, Phlegma na'rium crassum, Mucor seu Pitui'ta seu Blenna seu Lympha mucule'nta na'rium, Apomyx'ia, vulgarly called Snot, Snob, Snoth, (F.) Morve, is the mucus secreted by the Schneiderian membrane.

Nasal Nerve, Naso-palpébral (Ch.), Naso-ocula'ris (Sömmering), Naso-cilia'ris. One of the three branches of the ophthalmic nerve of Willis. It enters the orbit by the sphenoidal fissure, passes along the inner paries of that cavity, and divides, opposite the internal and anterior orbitar foramen, into two branches. 1. The internal and posterior, which passes into the Foramen orbitarium internum anterius, enters the cranium beneath the dura mater, and passes into the nasal fossæ, through an aperture at the side of the Crista galli. It afterwards divides into several filaments: one of them—the Naso-lobar, of Chaussier—is very small, and descends on the posterior surface of the os nasi, and ramifies on the integuments of the ala nasi. A second terminates near the septum; others descend along the outer paries of the nasal fossæ. 2. The other is external and anterior, and is called the external nasal nerve. It is distributed to the outside of the orbit. Before dividing, the nasal nerve communicates with the ophthalmic ganglion, and gives off two or three ciliary nerves. Sömmering has given the name Posterior Nasal Nerves to the nerves which arise from the internal part of the spheno-palatine ganglion.

Nasal Notch, (F.) Échancrure nasale. A semicircular notch, situate between the nasal prominence of the frontal bone, and articulated with the nasal bones and the nasal processes of the superior maxillary bones.

Nasal Process, Maxillary bone, superior.

Nasal Prom'inence, (F.) Bosse nasale. A prominence, situate on the median line, at the anterior surface of the os frontis, between the two superciliary arches.

Nasal Region, Re'gio nasa'lis. The region of the nose.

Nasal Spines. These are three in number.

1. The Supe'rior nasal spine of the os frontis, occupying the middle of its nasal notch, and articulated before with the nasal bones, behind with the ethmoid. 2. The infe'rior and ante'rior nasal spine, situate at the inferior part of the anterior opening of the nasal fossæ. It is formed by the two superior maxillary bones; and 3. The infe'rior and poste'rior nasal spine, Épine guttu'rale (Ch.), a process, formed on the median line by the two palate bones at the posterior part of the palatine arch.

NASO-LABIA'LIS. A muscular fasciculus described by Albinus, which arises from the anterior extremity of the septum nasi, and terminates in the orbicularis oris.

NASO-PAL'ATINE, Naso-palati'nus. That which belongs to the nose and velum palati.

Naso-Palatine Ganglion is situate in the foramen palatinum anterius. Its greater extremity receives the two naso-palatine branches.

whilst the smaller gives off two or three filaments, which reach the palatine vault, where they ramify on the membrane of the same name, anastomosing with filaments of the great palatine nerve.

NASO-PALATINE NERVE, Nerve of Cotun'nius, is furnished by the spheno-palatine, which proceeds from the ganglion of Meckel. It traverses the vault of the nasal fossæ, and proceeds upon the septum between the two layers of the pituitary membrane. It enters the anterior palatine canal, and terminates at the superior angles of the naso-palatine ganglion, without attaining the mouth.

NASO-PALPÉBRAL, Orbicularis palpebrarum.

The nose is a pyramidal eminence, situate above the anterior apertures of the nasal fossæ, which it covers; and, consequently, occupying the middle and upper part of the face, between the forehead and upper lip, the orbits and the cheeks. Its lateral surfaces form, by uniting angularly, a more or less prominent line, called Dorsum seu Rhachis seu Spina Nasi, (F.) Dos du nez. This line terminates, anteriorly, by the lobe,—Lob'ulus. The sides are called Alæ Nasi, Pinnæ Naris, (F.) Ailes du nez. The columna is the inferior part of the partition. The part of the bone affected with necrosis becomes a foreign body, similar to the gangrenous eschar, and its separation must be accomplished by the efforts of nature, or by art. When necrosis occurs in the centre of long bones, it never extends to their articular extremities. The exterior layers of bone form a canal round the dead portion or sequestrum; between these swollen layers and the sequestrum, suppuration takes place; the matter presses against the bony canal; perforates it, and is discharged by apertures, which become fistulous.

In the treatment, the exit of the sequestrum must be facilitated by proper incisions, by the application of the trepan to the bone, &c.

NEEDLE, A'CUPUNCTURE, (F.) Aiguille à Acupuncture. An inflexible gold or silver needle; conical, very delicate, four inches long, furnished with a handle, and, at times, with a canula shorter than it by about half an inch. An ordinary needle, waxed at the head, will answer as a substitute for this. See Acupuncture.

NEEDLE, CAT'ARACT, Acus ophthal'mica, (F.) Aiguille à cataracte. Needles of gold, silver, and steel have been used; the latter, alone, at the present day. The cataract needle is employed to depress or tear the crystalline when opake. This needle is usually made from 15 to 24 lines long; and is attached to a fine handle. The extremity may be, as in Scarpa's and Langenbeck's, pointed, prismatic, triangular, and curved; in Dupuytren's and Walther's, flat, curved, and sharp-edged; in Hey's, flat, with a semicircular and sharp end; or, as in Beer's, Siebold's, Schmidt's, Himly's, Von Gräfe's, &c., straight and spear-pointed. A mark is generally placed upon the handle to inform the operator, — when the instrument is engaged in the eye,—what side corresponds to the crystalline.

NEEDLE FOR A COUNTER-OPENING, Acus invagina'ta, (F.) Aiguille à Contre-ouverture ou engainée ou à gaine, — a long, narrow instrument of steel; the point of which is fine and sharp on both sides;—the heel (talon) having an aperture to receive a thread, tape, &c., provided with a flat, silver sheath, shorter than the blade, the point of which it covers when passing through parts that have to be respected.

NEEDLE, DESCHAMP'S, Paupe's needle, (F.) Aiguille de Deschamps, A. à manche, &c., is the last described needle, fixed to a handle. The eye is placed near the point. It is employed in the ligature of deep-seated arteries.

NEEDLE, FIS'TULA, (F.) Aiguille à Fistule. A long, flat, flexible, silver instrument; having an aperture near one extremity; blunt at the other. This was formerly used for passing a seton into fistulous ulcers. On one of its sides was a groove for guiding a bistouri in case of neecssity.

Also, a long, steel instrument, terminated by a point like that of a trocar, which Desault employed for penetrating the rectum, when operating for fistula that had no internal aperture.

NEEDLE, HARE-LIP, (F.) Aiguille à Bec de Lièvre. A small, silver canula, to which is attached a spear-point, that can be readily withdrawn. This needle, armed with the point, is introduced at one side of the fissure in the lip, and through the other. The twisted suture is then applied, and the pin withdrawn.

NEEDLE, LIG'ATURE, (F.) Aiguille à ligature. A long, steel instrument, sharp towards one extremity, with an eye near the other, which was formerly used for suspending the circulation of blood prior to amputation, by being passed through the limb, so as to include the principal artery and a part of the muscles and integuments.

Also, a steel instrument of various dimensions, round towards one of its extremities, which was straight, and furnished with an aperture; curved and flat towards the opposite, which was pointed, and had a slight ridge on its concave side. At the commencement of the last century, this instrument was used to pass ligatures around vessels.

Also, a steel instrument of various dimensions, flat, regularly curved in the form of a semicircle, with a sharp or lance point, and a long eye, used with advantage in place of the last.

NEEDLE, PAUPE'S, Needle, Deschamp's.

NEEDLE, SETON, (F.) Aiguille à Séton. A long, narrow, steel blade; pointed and sharp at one extremity; pierced at the other by an aperture. The Aiguille à contre-ouverture may be used for the same purpose.

NEEDLE, SUTURE, (F.) Aiguille à Suture. For the twisted suture, the hare-lip needle is used; for the others, the straight or curved needle: the straight needle is preferable for stitching up the abdomen, &c., in dissection. In the suture of the tendons, a curved needle has been used: flat on both sides, and cutting only at the concave edge, in order that the instrument may pass between the tendinous fibres without dividing them.

NÉRIS, MINERAL WATERS OF. Néris is on the high road from Moulins to Limoges, eighty leagues from Paris. There are four springs, the water of which is clear, inodorous, tasteless, and has an unctuous feel. It contains carbonic acid gas, carbonate of soda, and sulphate of soda, chloride of sodium, silex, and an animal matter to which its 'oleaginous' property is probably owing. The waters are generally used in the form of thermal baths.

on the same day, or to bleeding coup sur coup. Termed Neroniana, because the philosopher Seneca was bled to death under Nero [?].

NERPRUN PURGATIF, Rhamnus.

NERVE, Nervus, Neuron, νευρον, 'a string.' (F.) Nerf. Neuron and Nervus meant also, with the ancients, a tendon and a ligament, Partes nervo'sæ; and hence the different acceptations of 'nervous;'—'a man of nerve—a strong, nervous man; and a weak, nervous woman.' The nerves are tubular cords of the same substance as that which composes the encephalon and spinal marrow. They extend from one or other of the nervous centres to every part of the body, communicating, frequently, with each other; forming plexuses, and, occasionally, ganglions; and being, at length, lost in the parenchyma of organs. There are 42 pairs, and, according to their origin, they are termed Cranial or Encephalic, and Spinal. Each nerve is composed of several filaments or cords placed alongside each other, and is surrounded by a neurilemma. The encephalic nerves, in general, have only one root in the brain, whilst the spinal arise from the marrow by two roots: the one from an anterior fasciculus of filaments, the other from a posterior, separated from each other by the Ligamentum denticulatum; uniting outside this ligament, and presenting, near the intervertebral foramen, a ganglion formed only by the posterior root. The two roots make, afterwards, but one nerve; and, like the encephalic nerves, proceed to their destination, subdividing into rami and ramusculi, until they are finally lost in the texture of the organs. The trunks first formed are commonly round, and proceed alone, or accompany the great vessels, being placed in the areolar spaces which separate the organs, and are thus protected from injury. Their manner of termination we are not acquainted with; whether the nervous pulp, for instance, as is more probably the fact, be distributed or lost in a membrane, as seems to be the case with the nerves of sight, hearing, and smell,—or are looped. Certain it is, that there is considerable difference in the organs, as respects the quantity of nerves that terminate in them; and the particular arrangement of the nervous extremities. Some organs have numerous nerves; others seem to have none: a circumstance which influences considerably the sensibility of parts.

The Encephalic Nerves arise from the encephalon, or are inserted into it; (according as we consider the brain the origin or termination of the nerves;) and make their exit by foramina at the base of the skull. They are 12 in number. The spinal nerves are 31 in number, 8 cervical, 12 dorsal, 5 lumbar, and 6 sacral: the four inferior cervical being much larger than the superior, because they furnish the nerves of the upper extremities.

Classifications of the nerves have been recommended according to their uses, in preference to the ordinary anatomical arrangement. It has been remarked that the encephalic nerves have generally one root; the spinal two. Experiments and pathological facts have proved, that the anterior column of the marrow and the anterior roots of the spinal nerves are inservient to volition or voluntary motion: and that the posterior column and roots are destined for sensibility. Hence the spinal nerves, which have two roots, must be the conductors both of motion and feeling; whilst the encephalic, which, with but few exceptions, have but one, can possess but one of these properties:—they must be either sensitive or motor, according as they arise from the posterior or anterior column of the medulla: and, consequently, three classes of nerves may be distinguished.

1. Sensory..... { Arising, by a single root, from the posterior column of the medulla oblongata or spinal marrow.
2. Motor..... { Arising, by a single root, from the anterior column of the same parts.
3. Sensory and Motor..... { Which have two roots: one from the anterior, and one from the posterior column.

According to Sir Charles Bell, the medulla oblongata is composed of three columns on each side; an anterior, a middle, and a posterior. Whilst the anterior and posterior columns produce the nerves of motion and sensation respectively, the middle, according to Sir Charles, gives rise to a third set of nerves — the respiratory. To this order belong:—

1. The accessory nerve of Willis, or superior respiratory.
2. The par vagum.
3. The glosso-pharyngeal.
4. The facial or respiratory of the face.
5. The phrenic.
6. A nerve which has the same origin as the phrenic;—the external respiratory.

When a horse has been hard-ridden, every one of these nerves is in action.

This division is now, however, generally abandoned, and there does not seem to be a third column, especially destined for respiration.

Sir C. Bell, again, reduced the system of nerves to two great classes. 1. Those that are regular, primitive, symmetrical, and common to all animals, from the worm to man; which have double roots, and preside over sensibility and motion: and, 2. The irregular or superadded, which are added to the preceding, in proportion as the organization of animals offers new or more complicated organs. To the first class belong all the spinal nerves and at least one encephalic — the 5th pair; — to the second, the rest of the nervous system.

Dr. Marshall Hall has proposed a division of the nervous system, which is calculated to explain many of the anomalous circumstances so frequently witnessed. He proposes to divide all the nerves into, 1. The cerebral or the sentient and voluntary. 2. The true spinal or excito-motory. 3. The ganglionic or cyclo-ganglionic,— the nutrient and secretory. If the sentient and voluntary functions be destroyed by a blow upon the head, the sphincter muscles will still contract when irritated, because the irritation is conveyed to the spine, and the reflex action takes place to the muscle so as to throw it into contraction. But if the spinal marrow be now destroyed, the sphincters remain entirely motionless, because the centre of the system is destroyed. Dr. Hall thinks that a peculiar set of nerves constitutes, with the vesicular centre of the marrow as their axis, the second subdivision of the nervous system; and as those of the first subdivision are distinguished into sentient and voluntary, these may be distinguished into the excitor and motory. The first, or the excitor nerves, pursue their course principally from internal surfaces, characterized by peculiar excitabilities, to the centre of the medulla oblongata and m. spinalis; the second, or the motor nerves, pursue a reflex course from the medulla to the muscles, having peculiar actions concerned principally in ingestion and egestion. The motions connected with the first or cerebral subdivision are sometimes, indeed frequently, spontaneous; those connected with the true spinal are, he believes, always excited. Dr. Hall thinks, too, that there is good reason for viewing the fifth, and posterior spinal nerves as constituting an external ganglionic system for the nutrition of the external organs; and he proposes to divide the ganglionic subdivision of the nervous system into, 1. The internal ganglionic, which includes that usually denominated the sympathetic, and probably filaments of the pneumogastric; and, 2. The external ganglionic, embracing the fifth and posterior spinal nerves. To the cerebral system he assigns all diseases of sensation, perception, judgment, and volition — therefore all painful, mental, and comatose, and some paralytic diseases. To the true spinal, excito-motory, reflex, or diastaltic nervous system, belong all spasmodic and certain paralytic diseases. He properly adds, that these two parts of the nervous system influence each other both in health and disease, as they both influence the ganglionic system.

The main views of Dr. Hall on the excito-motory function have been generally embraced.

The following tabular view of the arrangement and connexions of the nerves and nervous centres has been given by Dr. Carpenter. It affords a good general view, although some of the details might admit of modification.

Tabular View of the Nervous Centres.

Afferent fibres derived from Sensory Ganglia; efferent fibres transmitted to motor centres.	Cerebral Ganglia, the seat of the formation of Ideas, and the instrument of the Reasoning processes and Will; participating also with the Sensory Ganglia in the formation of the Emotions; and thus the original source of Voluntary and Emotional movements.	Afferent fibres derived from Sensory Ganglia; efferent fibres transmitted to motor centres.
Afferent fibres derived from posterior column of spinal cord; efferent fibres transmitted into posterior column.	Cerebellic Ganglia, for harmonization of muscular actions; including also the ganglionic centre of the sexual sense (?).	Afferent fibres derived from posterior column of spinal cord; efferent fibres transmitted into motor column.
	Cranio-Spinal Axis, or centre of Automatic actions; including—
Radiating fibres to Cerebral Ganglia;—Nerves of Common and Special Sensation; — Motor nerves forming part of general motor system.	Sensory Ganglia, the seat of Sensation, and centre of Consensual (or Instinctive) movements, or of Automatic actions involving sensation.	Radiating fibres to Cerebral Ganglia;—Nerves of Common and Special Sensation; — Motor nerves forming part of general motor system.
Afferent and motor nerves of Respiration, Deglutition, &c.	Fibrous strands, connecting the Spinal Cord and Sensory Ganglia. Respiratory and Stomato-Gastric Ganglia, forming the true centres of the Medulla Oblongata; instruments of Reflex movements or automatic actions independent of sensation. Fibrous strands, connecting the Spinal Cord and Sensory Ganglia.	Afferent and motor nerves of Respiration, Deglutition, &c
Afferent and motor fibres, forming Trunks of Spinal Nerves.	Fibrous strands, connecting different segments with each other; and with Medulla Oblongata and Sensory Ganglia. Spinal Ganglion, or True Spinal Cord, consisting of a coalesced series of segmental ganglia, the instruments of Reflex operations, or Automatic actions independent of Sensation. Fibrous strands, connecting different segments with each other; and with Medulla Oblongata and Sensory Ganglia.	Afferent and motor fibres, forming Trunks of Spinal Nerves.

The nerves are sheathed, and are united to the neighbouring parts, by an abundant layer of fatty areolar texture, which sends, inwards, prolongations that separate the nervous cords and filaments from each other. The arterial trunks, distributed to them, transmit branches into their interior. The veins follow the same course as the arteries. Absorbents are not easily traced even on the greatest trunks.

Nerve Fibres, Fila ner'vea, Fibræ ner'veæ. In the nerves of the higher animals, two forms of nerve fibre exist—the tubular, and the gelatinous. In the minute fibrils or tubules, Tu'buli ner'vei, full of nervous matter, which constitute the former, there is a difference between the central and peripheral portion:—the former has been called the axis cylinder and primitive band; the latter, the medullary or white substance of Schwann,—being that to which the peculiarly white aspect of cerebrospinal nerves is principally due. In the gelatinous fibre, no tubular envelope can be distinguished, and the white substance of Schwann seems to be wanting. It contains numerous cell-nuclei. See Neurine.

rous pain. A generic name for a certain number of diseases, the chief symptom of which is a very acute pain, exacerbating or intermitting, which follows the course of a nervous branch, extends to its ramifications, and seems, therefore, to be seated in the nerve. The principal neuralgiæ have been distinguished by the names facial (of which the infra-orbitar, maxillary, and frontal are but divisions)—the ilio-scrotal, femoro-popliteal, femoro-pretibial, plantar, and cubito-digital. A division of anomalous neuralgiæ has likewise been admitted.

All varieties of neuralgia are obstinate, and the greatest diversity of means has been made use of:—bleeding, general and local,—emetics, purgatives, rubefacients, vesicants, actual cautery, narcotics, mercurial frictions, electricity; destruction of a portion of the nerve, &c. The most successful remedy, perhaps, is the carbonate of iron, given in doses of some magnitude; as, for instance, ℥ss or ℈ij, twice or thrice a day, in molasses. This plan of treatment, continued for a month or two, will often relieve, and ultimately remove this much dreaded affection. The mode in which it acts is by no means clear; but it is almost as certain as any other remedy used in disease in producing its salutary effects. The bowels must be kept free; and all inflammatory symptoms removed during its administration.

Neural'gia, Anom'alous. Under this name Chaussier has included different neuroses, some of which are characterized by acute pains circumscribed within a short compass, or extending by irradiations, but not having their seat in the course of a nerve; and others which are occasioned by tumours in the course of a nerve, or which succeed contusions or incomplete divisions of nerves.

Neuralgia Brachialis, Brachialgia—n. Brachio-thoracica, Angina pectoris — n. Cerebralis, Hemicrania — n. Cœliaca, Neuralgia of the solar plexus (Romberg) — n. Cruralis, N. femoro-tibialis.

Neuralgia Cu'bito-Digitalis, Is'chias nervo'sa digita'lis. In this variety the pain extends from the part where the nerve passes under the inner condyle to the back of the hand and to its cubital edge.

Neuralgia Dentalis, Odontalgia nervosa.

It may be seated in the frontal nerve, in the infra-orbitar, or in the maxillary branch of the fifth pair.

Metopodyn'ia, Brow-ague, Neural'gia fronta'lis, Ophthalmodyn'ia, Tic douloureux, Dolor period'icus, &c., commences at the superciliary foramen and extends along the ramifications of the frontal nerve that are distributed on the forehead, upper eyelid, caruncula lacrymalis, and nasal angle of the eyelids. Sometimes it is felt particularly in the orbit.

Neuralgia infra-orbita'ria, Dolor faciei atrox, Rheumatis'mus cancro'sus, Trismus clon'icus, Prosopal'gia, Febris top'ica, Odontal'gia remit'tens et intermit'tens, Hemicra'nia sæva, Infra-orbitar neuralgia, Tic douloureux, is chiefly felt in the infra-orbitar foramen, whence it passes to the cheek, upper lip, ala nasi, lower eyelid, &c.

In Neuralgia maxilla'ris, Gnathal'gia, Gnathoneural'gia, Tic douloureux, Trismus catarrha'lis maxillaris, the pain usually sets out from the mental foramen and passes to the chin, lips, temple, teeth, and tongue.

Neuralgia, False. A term assigned to pains along a nerve or its ramifications, produced by some body compressing it,—those pains terminating with the removal of the compressing cause.

Devonshire) Bone-shave, (F.) Sciatique, Goutte sciatique. This is characterized by pain following the great sciatic nerve from the ischiatic notch to the ham, and along the peroneal surface of the leg to the sole of the foot.

The fine transparent, and apparently fibrous membrane that surrounds the nerves—to every filament of which it forms a true canal.

Robin restricts the term périnèvre to the structure that invests the primitive bundles of nerves; and every nervous filament. It differs from the neurilemma, in its ordinary acceptation, which forms a coat of some thickness in the larger nerves, and supports the nutrient vessels, whilst the périnèvre exhibits no capillaries.

NEURINE, Medul'la nervo'rum, (F.) Névrine, Albumine cérébrale ou du cerveau. from νευρον, 'a nerve.' The substance of which the nervous system is composed. It consists chiefly of albumen and a peculiar fatty matter, associated with phosphorus. There are two kinds of neurine — the one vesicular or consisting essentially of nerve vesicles or nerve cells or corpuscles, or, as they are sometimes called, from their prevailing in the ganglia—ganglion corpuscles and ganglion globules; the other, the tubular, formed — as the word imports — of tubules. The former is the cineritious or cortical nervous matter of the older anatomists; — the latter, the white or medullary. The vesicular neurine has appeared to be restricted to the production and distribution of nerve-power; the tubular, to its conduction; yet the experiments of Dr. Brown-Séquard show, that the former conveys sensitive impressions from the posterior spinal roots to the brain.

When given internally, it is in the form of the ACIDUM NI'TRICUM DILU'TUM, Spir'itus nitri simplex seu nitri vulga'ris— Diluted nitric acid, which, in the Pharmacopœia of the United States, consists of nitric acid, f℥i, water, f℥ix by measure. Diluted largely with water, it is used, as a drink in fevers of the typhoid kind; in chronic affections of the liver, syphilis, &c.; but in the latter affections, it is not to be depended upon.

NI'TROGEN, GA'SEOUS OXIDE OF, Nitrous oxide, Protox'ide of nitrogen or of azote, Paradise, Intoxicating or Laughing gas, Dephlogis'ticated nitrous gas, Gas azot'icum oxygena'tum. This gas, when respired, produces singular effects; great mental and corporeal excitement; and, generally, so much exhilaration as to render the appellation, "laughing gas" by no means inappropriate. It has not been much used in medicine, although recommended in paralysis. Its effects are too violent and too transient to render it a valuable remedial agent; and, in the delicate, it has been productive of unpleasant effects, inducing palpitation, fainting, and convulsions.

A mixture of the nitric and muriatic acids, has been used in diseases of the liver, in the form of a bath for the feet and legs, made sharply acidulous. It has, also, been employed, and with more uniform results, in cutaneous affections. Whatever advantage it may posses in internal diseases—and these advantages are doubtful—they are probably dependent upon the chlorine formed by the mixture, or upon the properties possessed by the mineral acids in general. See Chlorine.

The Acidum nitro-muriaticum of the Pharmacopœia of the United States is formed by mixing four fluidounces of nitric acid with eight of muriatic acid.

A collection of terms or words peculiar to a science or art. In all sciences, nomenclature is an object of importance; and each term should convey to the student a definite meaning. The Lavoisierian nomenclature was a valuable gift to chemistry; and anatomy has derived advantage from the labours of Barclay, Dumas, and Chaussier, who have given names to parts indicative of their situation. See Muscle. The nomenclature of pathology has required the greatest attention: and although repeated attempts have been made to improve it, the barbarous terms that disgrace it are still frequently adopted. It consists of Hebrew and Arabic terms; Greek and Latin, French, Italian, Spanish, German, English, and even Indian, African, and Mexican; often barbarously and illegitimately compounded. A want of principle in founding the technical terms of medicine is every where observable. They have been formed:—1. From colour; as Melæna, Melas, Atrabilis, Leuce, Alphos, Chlorosis, Rubeola, Scarlatina, Purpura, &c. 2. From duration; as ephemeral, quotidian, tertian, and quartan, continued, and intermittent, &c. 3. From Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Insects, and Plants; as Rabies canina, Cynanche, Boulimia, Pica, Hippopyon, Elephantiasis, Urticaria, Lichen, Ichthyo'sis, &c. 4. Nosological arrangements have, also, been formed of single families or groups of diseases. Plenck, of Baden, is the author of two different treatises of this kind: the one, a methodical arrangement of the diseases of the eyes, and the other, of cutaneous diseases. Dr. Willan published an arrangement of cutaneous diseases, which was completed by Dr. Bateman, and adopted into the Nosology of Dr. Hosack. Mr. Abernethy, also, published a methodical classification of tumours, and many other partial nosological classifications might be enumerated. Also, Pathology.

It gives passage to the sciatic nerve, pyramidalis muscle, and to the superior gluteal vessels and nerves. The latter is much smaller than the other, from which it is separated by the sciatic spine. It gives passage to the tendon of the obturator internus, and to the internal pudic vessels and nerves.

NOTCH, PAROT'ID, (F.) Échancrure parotidienne, is the triangular space comprised between the parotid edge of the inferior maxillary bone and the mastoid process; so called, because it lodges the parotid gland. The notches in soft parts are generally called Fissures.

NUTRIT''ION, Nutrit''io, Nutrica'tio, Nutri'tus, Alitu'ra, Threpsis, from nutrire, nutritum, 'to nourish.' Nutrition is that function by which the nutritive matter already elaborated by the various organic actions, loses its own nature, and assumes that of the different living tissues, — to repair their losses and maintain their strength. Sometimes the word is used in a more extended signification, to express the whole series of actions by which the two constant movements of composition and decomposition are accomplished, in organized bodies. Nutrition, then, would comprehend digestion, absorption, respiration, circulation, and assimilation; the latter being nutrition, properly so called, and being effected in the intermediate system over the whole of the body, — the cells of the tissues attracting from the blood the elements necessary for their reparation.

NUTRITION, FORCE OF, Plastic force.

It affects both eyes at once, when idiopathic. Its duration is uncertain, and treatment very obscure. It is, however, a disease of nervous irritability, and one of excitement of the visual nerve in particular. The indications of cure will consequently be — to allay direct irritation in every way: to excite counter-irritation by blisters; and to gradually accustom the eye to the impression of light.

They are formed each of two folds of the mucous membrane of the vulva; and contain, in their substance, a thin layer of spongy erectile tissue. Their use seems to be, — not, as was once supposed, to direct the course of the urine, which notion gave rise to their name, but to favour the elongation and dilatation of the vagina in pregnancy and labour.

The word νυμφη, Nymphē, has also been used synonymously with clitoris by Oribasius, Aëtius, &c.

It occurs in those particularly, who possess a nervous temperament, and vivid imagination, especially if excited by improper language, masturbation, &c. Its course, as described, is as follows. In the commencement, the sufferer is a prey to perpetual contests between feelings of modesty and impetuous desires. At an after period, she abandons herself to the latter, seeking no longer to restrain them. In the last stage the obscenity is disgusting; and the mental alienation, for such it is, becomes complete. The treatment consists in the use of the same means as are required in the satyriasis of man. When the mental alienation is complete, solitude is indispensable.

NYMPHON'CUS, from νυμφη, 'the nympha,' and ογκος, 'a tumour.' A morbid tumefaction of the nymphæ.

OBLINITIO, Inunction.

OBLIQUE', Obli'quus, Any thing inclined, or which deviates from the vertical line. Anatomists have given this name to certain muscles, which have an oblique direction as regards the plane that divides the body into two equal and symmetrical halves. These are:—

OBLIQUE MUSCLES OF THE ABDOMEN. They are two in number, and distinguished into: 1. Obliquus Exter'nus Abdom'inis seu descen'dens exter'nus seu descendens seu major, (F.) Ilio-pubo costo-abdom'inal, Costo-abdom'inal (Ch.), Grand oblique, Oblique externe. One of the broadest muscles of the body. It is situate at the lateral and anterior part of the abdomen; and is flat and quadrilateral. It is attached, above, to the outer surface and lower edge of the 7 or 8 last ribs: below, to the anterior third of the external lip of the crista ilii: before, it terminates at the linea alba by means of a broad and strong aponeurosis, which covers the rectus, and presents towards its inferior part two very solid fibrous fasciculi, which are inserted, —the one at the symphysis, the other at the spine of the pubis, — under the name of Pillars of the Abdominal Ring. These pillars leave between them an opening, which forms the inferior orifice of the inguinal canal. The obliquus externus abdominis depresses the ribs, and carries them backwards during a strong expiration. It impresses on the chest a movement of rotation, and bends the thorax upon the pelvis, and conversely. It contracts, also, the abdominal cavity. 2. Obliquus Inter'nus Abdomi'nis seu ascendens seu minor seu internus seu ascendens internus, Mus'culus acclivis, (F.) Ilio-lumbo-costo-abdominal, Ilio-abdominal (Ch.), Muscle petit oblique ou oblique interne, is broad, especially before; thin, and irregularly quadrilateral, like the preceding, beneath which it is situate. It is attached, above, to the inferior edge of the cartilages of the 5th, 4th, 3d, and 2d false ribs; below, to the anterior two-thirds of the interstice of the crista ilii, to the posterior part of the crural arch, and to the pubis; behind, to the spinous processes of the last two lumbar vertebræ, and to those of the first two portions of the sacrum; before, to the linea alba. Its upper fibres run obliquely upwards and forwards; the middle are horizontal; and the lower pass obliquely downwards and forwards.

These last, in the male, are dragged down through the inguinal ring, when the testicle descends, and form the two fasciculi of the cremaster.

The obliquus internus resembles the O. externus in function.

OBLIQUE MUSCLES OF THE EYE, Amato'rii, Circumagen'tes, Rotato'res Oc'uli, are two in number.

They are distinguished into: 1. Obliquus Superior Oculi, Amato'rius mus'culus, Trochlea'ris, Trochlea'tor, Obliquus major. Circumductio'nis op'ifex, Longis'simus oc'uli, (F.) Optico-trochlei sclérotici-en, Grand trochléateur (Ch.), Grand oblique de l'œil, O. supérieur de l'œil, Amoureux (Muscle,) is situate at the inner and upper part of the orbit. It is small, round, fusiform, and reflected upon itself in the middle of its course. Behind, it is attached to the inside of the foramen opticum; and when it arrives opposite the internal orbitar process, it becomes a small, round tendon, which slides in a cartilaginous pulley fixed to the os frontis, and is reflected, at an acute angle, to proceed downwards and outwards, and to attach itself to the outer and back part of the globe of the eye. This muscle carries the globe of the eye forwards and inwards; making it experience a movement of rotation, which directs the pupil downwards and inwards. This is conceived to be an involuntary muscle as well as the next. In sleep, according to Sir C. Bell, when the power over the straight or voluntary muscles of the organ is nearly lost, the eye is given up to the oblique muscles, which lodge the transparent cornea under the upper eyelid. At the approach of death, the same thing is observable; hence, the turning up of the eye, at such time, is not an evidence of agony or suffering, but of insensibility. 2. Obli'quus Infe'rior seu minor oculi, (F.) Maxillo-sclératicien, Petit Trochléateur (Ch.), Petit oblique ou oblique inférieur de l'œil, is situate at the anterior and inferior part of the orbit. It is flat and attached to the inner and anterior part of the orbitar surface of the superior maxillary bone, on the outside of the lachrymal gutter; from thence it passes outwards and backwards, and terminates by an aponeurosis, at the posterior and inner part of the globe of the eye. It carries the globe of the eye inwards and forwards; and directs the pupil upwards and outwards.

OBLIQUE MUSCLES OF THE HEAD. These are two in number. I. Obliquus Superior seu minor Cap'itis, (F.) Trachélo-atloïdo-occipital, Atloïdo-sous-mastoïdien (Ch.), Muscle oblique supérieur ou petit oblique de la tête. This muscle is situate at the sides of, and behind, the articulation of the head: it is flat and attached, on the one hand, to the top of the transverse process of the atlas; and, on the other, terminates at the occipital bone, beneath the inferior curved line, and sometimes, also, at the mastoid region of the temporal bone. It extends the head,—inclining it to one side. 2. Obliquus Inferior Capitis, Obliquus major, (F.) Spini-axoïdo-trachéli-atloïdien, Axoïdo-atloïdien (Ch.), Oblique inférieur ou grand oblique de la tête, is situate at the posterior part of the neck and head. It is round, fusiform; attached to the spinous process of the axis, and proceeds to terminate behind and below the summit of the transverse process of the atlas. It impresses, on the first vertebra and the head, a movement of rotation, which turns the face to one side.

OBLIQUE PROCESSES, see Vertebræ.

This word is employed in several acceptations. It expresses — 1. The action of observing — 2. The aggregate of knowledge, afforded by observation. OBTURA'TOR, Obturato'rius, (F.) Obturateur, from obturare, (akin to θυρα, 'a door,'[?]) 'to close,' 'stop up the entrance.' A name given in anatomy, to several parts.

Obturator Artery, Arteria obturato'ria seu obtura'trix, (F.) Sous-pubio fémorale (Ch.), Artère obturatrice, arises, most commonly, from the hypogastric. It is, however, frequently given off from the epigastric; a matter of importance to be determined in cases of femoral hernia. Of 500 obturator arteries examined by M. J. Cloquet, 340 were furnished by the hypogastric, and 152 by the epigastric or crural. When it arises from the hypogastric, it passes forwards and outwards, and then turns horizontally into the cavity of the pelvis, to issue from this cavity by the opening left at the upper part of the obturator membrane. When, on the contrary, the obturator artery arises from the epigastric or the crural, it descends obliquely inwards, behind the os pubis, to the obturator foramen. At its exit from the pelvis, the artery divides into two branches, a posterior and an anterior, which are distributed to the muscles of the anterior and superior part of the thigh.

Obtura'tor Fora'men, Fora'men Obturato'rium seu obtura'tum seu infra-pubia'num seu ova'lē seu thyroïdeum seu Thyroï'des seu Amplum Pelvis, (F.) Trou sous-pubien. A large opening, of an oval or triangular form, in the anterior part of the os innominatum, on the outside of the symphysis pubis and beneath the horizontal ramus of the os pubis. This foramen is closed by a membranous ligament.

Obturator Ligament or Membrane, Subpubic membrane, is a fibrous membrane, fixed to the whole circumference of the obturator foramen, except above, where an opening remains for the passage of the vessels and nerves of the same name.

Obturator Muscles, Obturato'res, Rotato'res fem'oris. These are two in number. They are divided into a. Obturator Exter'nus, Extra-pelvio-pubi-trochantérien, Sous-pubio-trochantérien externe (Ch.) A muscle, situate at the anterior and inner part of the thigh. It is broad, flat, and triangular; and is attached, on the one hand, to the anterior surface of the os pubis, to that of the ischium, and to the anterior surface of the obturator ligament. Its fleshy fibres converge to the tendon, which proceeds to be inserted at the inferior part of the cavity of the great trochanter. This muscle rotates the thigh outwards.

b. Obturator Inter'nus, Marsupia'lis, Bursa'lis, Intra-pelvio-trochantérien, Sous-pubio-trochantérien interne (Ch.) is seated, almost entirely, in the pelvis. It arises from the inner surface of the obturator ligament, and from the posterior part of the circumference of the obturator foramen, and is inserted, by means of a strong tendon, running between the two portions of the gemini, into the cavity at the root of the great trochanter; after having turned upon the ischium, which forms for it a kind of pulley. This muscle also rotates the thigh outwards.

Obturator Nerve, Sous-pubio-fémoral, (Ch.), proceeds principally from the 2d and 3d lumbar nerves. It descends into the pelvis; gains the obturator foramen; gives branches to the obturator muscles, and divides, behind the abductor primus and pectinalis, into two branches; one anterior, whose branches are distributed to the first two adductors, gracilis, and integuments; the other, posterior, distributing its ramifications to the obturator externus and third adductor.

Obturator Vein has, ordinarily, the same arrangement as the artery. It is common, however, to find it arising from the epigastric; whilst the corresponding artery proceeds from the hypogastric, and conversely.

The term obturator, (F.) Obturateur, is, also, applied to an instrument, adapted for closing an opening caused by a wound or disease.

OBTURATORES, Obturator muscles.

OBVOLVENTIA, Demulcents.

OCA, Oxalis tuberosa.

OCCÆCATIO, Cæcitas.

OCCIP'ITAL, Occipita'lis. That which belongs to the occiput.

Occipital Artery. This arises from the posterior part of the external carotid, beneath the parotid. It proceeds backwards, passes between the mastoid process and the transverse process of the atlas; reaches the occipital bone and divides into two branches, which may be called ascending posterior and anterior, and are distributed to the neighbouring muscles and ligaments.

Occip'ital Bone, Os occip'itis seu occipit'ii seu occipita'lē seu spheno-basila'rē seu memo'riæ seu nervo'sum seu basila'rē seu proræ seu pyx'idis seu sextum cra'nii seu lambdoï'des seu lambdæ seu landæ seu puppis seu nervo'sum seu fibro'sum seu pelvicephal'icum, (F.) Os occipital, is situate at the posterior and inferior part of the cranium, which it assists in forming. It is flat, symmetrical, and curved upon itself. It presents, 1. An occipital or posterior surface, which is convex, and has, upon the median line, the basilary surface, the foramen magnum, through which passes the spinal marrow with its membranes and vessels,—the external occipital crest, the external occipital protuberance; and, at the sides, the upper curved line, large rough arched ridge or transverse arch or linea semicircularis, the lower curved line, the posterior condyloid fossæ, the condyles for the articulation of this bone with the atlas; and the anterior condyloid fossæ, pierced by a foramen for the passage of the ninth pair of nerves. 2. A cerebral or anterior surface. On the median line are: the basilary fossæ, the inner orifice of the foramen magnum, the internal occipital crest, the internal occipital protuberance, the cruciform spine; a channel, which lodges the termination of the straight sinus, and on each side, the occipital fossæ, distinguished into superior or cerebral, and inferior or cerebellous, and separated by a groove which lodges the lateral sinus. 3. The surfaces of the occipital bone are separated by four ridges and four angles. The two superior edges are articulated with the parietal bones; the two lower join the temporal; and the anterior angle, under the name basilary process, is united to the sphenoid.

The occipital bone is developed from four points of ossification; and sometimes from a greater number.

Occipital Muscle, Occipita'lis. Many anatomists have given this name to the posterior fasciculus of the occipito-frontalis.

Occipital Nerve, Sub-occipital nerve, (F.) Première paire trachélienne (Ch.), Nerf occipital ou sous occipital. It arises from the upper part of the spinal marrow by eight or ten filaments, united in two fasciculi. Thus formed, it passes between the foramen magnum and the posterior arch of the atlas; and, at this place, forms a long ganglion, afterwards dividing into two branches. Of these, the anterior, which is long and small, makes a turn above the transverse process of the atlas and forms an anastomotic noose with a branch of the second cervical nerve. The posterior branch, larger and shorter, divides into seven or eight branches, which are distributed to the muscles of the upper and back part of the neck.

Occipital Region, Occiput.

Occipital Vein. Its roots follow exactly the course of the branches of the artery, and unite into a single trunk, which opens into the internal jugular vein, and sometimes into the external.

OCCIPITIUM, Occiput.

OCCIP'ITO-AT'LOID, Occipito-atloïdeus, (F.) Occipito-atloïdien. That which has reference to the occiput and atlas.

Occipito-Atloid Articulation is the articulation of the condyles of the occipital bone with the superior articular cavities of the atlas. It is strengthened by two ligaments; the one anterior, the other posterior, called occipito-atloid ligaments: the one extends from the anterior, the other from the posterior, arch of the atlas, to the corresponding portion of the circumference of the foramen magnum.

OCCIP'ITO-AX'OID, Occipito-axoïdeus, (F.) Occipito-axoïdien. That which relates to the occipital bone and the axis or second vertebra.

Occipito-axoid Articulation is the connexion of the occipital bone with the axis or second vertebra, although these bones are not really articulated, but are merely retained in apposition by three strong ligaments, the posterior of which is called the occipito-axoid, and the two others odontoid.

OCCIPITO-FRONTA'LIS, Digas'tricus cra'nii, Epicra'nius, Fronta'lis et occipitalis. The majority of anatomists call by this name the whole of the fleshy plane, with the epicranial or coronal aponeurosis, (see Culotte,) which covers the head from the occiput to the forehead. It is attached, by its posterior fasciculus, to the two outer thirds of the upper curved line of the occipital bone, and to the outer surface of the mastoid portion of the temporal; and, by its anterior fasciculus, it terminates at the eyebrow, where it becomes confounded with the superciliaris, pyramidalis nasi, and orbicularis palpebrarum.

The occipito-frontalis, by the contraction of its anterior fasciculus, draws forward a part of the integuments of the cranium. It wrinkles the skin of the forehead transversely, and may, also contribute to open the eye by its decussation with the orbicularis palpebrarum. The posterior fasciculus of the muscle draws backwards a part of the skin of the cranium, and assists in stretching the common aponeurosis.

OCCIP'ITO-MENINGE'AL. That which belongs to the occipital bone, and to the meninge or dura mater.

Occipito-meningeal Artery, in Chaussier's nomenclature, is a branch of the vertebral, given off to the dura mater at its entrance into the cranium.

OC'CIPUT, Occipit'ium (ob. and caput), Regio occipita'lis, In'ion, Opisthocra'nium, Opisthocepha'lon, Hysterocra'nium, Prora, Occipi'tium. The back part of the head, formed by the occipital bone.

Occiput, Soft, Craniotabes.

OCCLU'SION, Occlu'sio, Mycē, from occludere, occlusum, 'to shut up.' Sometimes this word signifies, simply, the transient approximation of the edges of a natural opening — the occlusion of the eyelids, for example; at others it is synonymous with imperforation, as occlusion of the pupil, vagina, &c.

A musculo-membranous canal, cylindrical, and depressed from before to behind, which extends from the inferior extremity of the pharynx to the upper orifice of the stomach. At its origin, it is situate in the median line; but beneath the larynx, it deviates to the left, and in the chest experiences different reflections. In its cervical portion, it corresponds, behind, with the spine; before, with the larynx and trachea; and, at the sides, it is close to the primitive carotids, internal jugular veins, par vagum, recurrent nerves, &c. In its inferior or thoracic portion, the œsophagus is entirely contained in the posterior mediastinum; and enters the abdomen through the œsophageal aperture, Fora'men œsophage'um, of the diaphragm. The œsophagus is composed of a very strong muscular layer, sometimes called Tunica vagina'lis gulæ; formed, itself, of two sets of fibres, the external being general longitudinal, the internal transverse or annular. 2. Of a mucous membrane which is soft, fine, thin, and white, especially at its lower part. It is continuous, above, with the mucous membrane of the pharynx. The mucous follicles, found beneath it, are not numerous, and have been called Œsophageal glands. The arteries of the œsophagus proceed, in the neck, from the thyroid; in the chest, from the bronchial arteries and directly from the aorta;—in the abdomen, from the inferior phrenic, and coronaria ventriculi. Its veins empty themselves into the inferior thyroid, the vena cava superior, the internal mammary, azygos, bronchial, phrenic, and coronaria ventriculi. Its lymphatics pass into the ganglia surrounding it. Its nerves are afforded by the pharyngeal and pulmonary plexuses; by the cardiac nerves; the thoracic ganglia, and, especially, by the pneumogastries and their recurrent branches.

OLEA ANIMA'LIA, Animal oils, (F.) Huiles animales. A name given to fixed oils holding in solution the mucilaginous and gelatinous principles of certain animals, as the Oil of frogs, Oil of scorpions, Oil of spiders, &c. Sometimes, also, the term animal oils is given to empyreumatic oils, produced during the decomposition of animal substances by heat.

OLEA DESTILLATA, O. Volatilia.

OLEA EMPYREUMAT'ICA, Empyreumat'ic oils, (F.) Huiles empyreumatiques ou pyrogénées, Pyrélaïnes. Oils which have an empyreumatic or burnt smell. They are obtained by treating vegetable or animal matters by heat, in close vessels. They do not exist in organized bodies, but are formed during their decomposition by fire. The animal oil of Dippel is an empyreumatic oil.

OLEA EUROPÆ'A, O. sati'va seu lancifo'lia seu polymor'pha seu Gal'lica, Oli'va, Olive tree, ἐλαια, Elæ'a, (F.) Olivier; (Fruit) Olive. Nat. Ord. Jasmineæ. Sex. Syst. Diandria Monogynia. The leaves of the olive are bitter, and an extract prepared from them, and a substance called olivi'na, the bitter principle of the leaves, have been given in Italy as antiperiodics. The fruit, when pickled, is extremely grateful to some stomachs. Olives, as met with in the shops, are prepared from the green, unripe fruit, repeatedly steeped in water. To this, some quicklime or alkaline salt is added, and, afterwards, they are washed and preserved in a pickle of common salt and water. From this fruit is prepared the Olive oil or Salad oil of the Pharmacopœias, which is obtained by grinding and pressing the olives, when thoroughly ripe. The finer and purer oil issues first by gentle pressure, and the inferior sort on heating what is left, and pressing it more strongly. See Oleum Olivæ. In Calabria, an odorous resin exudes from its trunk, which is employed as a perfume by the Neapolitans.

A gum flows from certain wild olives, in warm countries, which consists, according to Pelletier, of a resin, a little benzoic acid, and a peculiar substance, called Olivile. It is in yellow masses, of a slightly acrid taste, and of a vanilla smell. It is called Oleæ gummi, O. resi'na, and O. balsa'mum, (F.) Gomme olivier, and is esteemed astringent and detersive.

OLEA FIXA SEU PIN'GUIA, Expressed, Fixed or Fatty oils, (F.) Huiles fixes ou grasses, Oléols. All the oils obtained from the seeds or pericarps of vegetables, without distillation, and which are viscid, but slightly odorous and sapid; lighter than water, and insoluble in alcohol. The rancidity of oils depends on the absorption of oxygen, and therefore they should be kept in bulk as much as possible, and in narrow-necked bottles, so that a very small surface only can be exposed to the air. All the fixed oils are emollient, and, in a certain dose, they act as purgatives and emetics. They are prepared by expressing the fruit or seed containing them.

OLEA FUGA'CIA, Fuga'cious oils, (F.) Huiles fugaces. A name given to oils which are so volatile that, in order to obtain them, recourse must be had to a different process from that employed for other essential oils. Such are the oils of jessamine, lily, violet, &c.

OLEA GALLICA, O. Europæa—o. Lancifolia, O. Europæa.

OLEA MEDICINA'LIA, Medic'inal oils, (F.) Huiles Médicinales, Eléolés, Solution par les huiles. A name given to oils prepared by macerating, infusing, or boiling medicinal substances in olive or any other fixed oils. These oils may then be regarded as oily solutions of certain medicinal substances; whence they can never be simple. They have, however, been divided into simple and compound medicinal oils. To the former belong the Oils of St. John's wort, of the Solanum nigrum, &c.; to the other—which have often been called Oily balsams, (F.) Baumes huileux—the Balsams of Fioraventi, Metz, &c. Medicinal oils are, almost always, employed externally.

OLEA POLYMORPHA, O. Europæa—o. Sativa, O. Europæa.

OLEA VOLATI'LIA, O. destilla'ta, Æthero'leo, Vol'atile, Ethe'real, Essential, or Distil'led oils, Es'sences, (F.) Huiles volatiles ou essentielles ou distillées ou éthérées, oléolats, oléules, oléoles. Oils found in aromatic vegetables, and in every part of them, except in the interior of the seeds. The majority are obtained by distillation; but some by expression. They possess unctuosity, inflammability, and viscidity, like the fixed oils; but they are generally odoriferous, pungent, and acrid. The greater part are lighter than water; but some are heavier, and congeal at a moderate temperature. They dissolve, in small quantity, in distilled water, by simple agitation. Almost all are soluble in alcohol. The odour and taste are the usual tests of their goodness. To preserve them, they should be kept in a cool place, in small bottles, quite full and well corked. Volatile oils are possessed of the aromatic properties of the plants whence they are obtained. They are all, when applied externally, stimulant and rubefacient. Pharmaceutical preparations, in which substances are dissolved in volatile oils, (F.) Solutions par les huiles volatiles, are termed by Béral, Myrolés.

Head or protection of the elbow. A large process at the upper extremity of the ulna, on which we lean. When this process is fractured, it is apt to be drawn up by the triceps, and much care is required to keep the parts in apposition.

OLFACTIF, Olfactory.

OLFAC'TION, Olfac'tus, from olfacere, olfactum, (olere, 'to smell,' and facere, 'to make,') 'to smell;' Osphre'sis, Osphra'sia, Osphre'sia, Osme'sis, Odora'tio, Odora'tus, Sensus osmomet'ricus, Sense of smell, Smelling, (F.) Odorat. The sense by which we perceive the impressions made on the olfactory nerves by the odorous particles suspended in the atmosphere. The olfactory nerve or first pair has usually been considered the great nerve of smell; and it is probably the nerve of special sensibility, general sensibility being communicated by the branches of the fifth pair, distributed on the pituitary membrane of the nose and sinuses.

OLFACTIVE, Olfactory.

OLFAC'TORY, Olfactive, Olfacti'vus, Olfacto'rius, Osphran'ticus, Osphrante'rius, Osphre'ticus, (F.) Olfactif. Same etymon. That which belongs or relates to the sense of smell.

This nerve, which probably arises from the medulla oblongata, is observed to leave the brain, opposite the inner part of the fissure of Sylvius, by three roots; which, by their union, form a triangular knot or expansion. When it reaches the ethmoid fossa it expands and forms a triangular ganglion, or grayish, soft bulb,—Bulbus olfacto'rius, Olfactory bulb, tubercle, or lobe,—which furnishes, from its inferior surface, the branches that have to be distributed to the nasal fossæ. These filaments are very numerous; they pass through the foramina in the cribriform plate and enter the nasal fossæ. They are distinguished into the internal, external, and middle. The former are distributed over the mucous membrane, covering the outer paries of the nasal fossæ; the second descend upon the septum, and the third are lost, almost immediately, on the portion of the pituitary membrane that lines the vault of the fossæ.
